

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OHIO EX REL. GEORGE B.
MOYER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FRANK L. BALDWIN.

(77 Ohio St. 532, 83 N. E. 907.)

Mandamus — restoration to office.

1. Mandamus is the proper remedy to restore a party to the possession of an office from which he has been illegally removed.

Municipal corporation — mayor — removal of officer.

2. Under the new Municipal Code, the mayor has authority to remove an officer or appointee in the police department upon inquiry into the cause of suspension, by the chief of police, of such officer or appointee;

but he is without original jurisdiction to inquire into charges against such an officer (other than the chief of police) or appointee, and, upon such an inquiry, he is without authority to remove an officer or appointee.

(February 18, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mahoning County to review a judgment dismissing a petition for mandamus after its allowance by the Court of Common Pleas for the purpose of restoring petitioner to an office from which he alleged he had been illegally removed. Writ allowed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

I. Scope of note.

The subject of this note necessarily limited the search for authorities to cases passing upon the right of an officer who had been illegally removed from his office to be reinstated by means of the writ of mandamus. There will, therefore, not be found in the note cases in which a mandamus has been granted or refused for the purpose of inducting into office in the first instance one who has been duly elected or appointed.

There have also been omitted, in compiling this note, all cases in which writs of mandamus were sought to restore to their offices clergymen, attorneys, or officers of a private or quasi public corporation or association, such as railroad companies, etc., or professional and fraternal societies or trade guilds, even where property rights were involved; nor have there been included in this note cases in which mandamus was sought to reinstate pupils or students in schools or colleges. All of the foregoing classes of cases have been regarded as lying beyond the scope of this note, the purpose of it being expressly to confine the discussion which follows to cases concerning public officers and governmental servants.

This note does not embrace any cases of proceedings by mandamus to restore to their offices or positions public officers who have been removed therefrom where the illegality or propriety of their removals depended upon the construction and application of particular statutes involving their right to hold or be continued in office. The more common statutes of this class are those regulative of appointments to and removals from places in the civil service after competitive examinations and certifications by civil-service boards or commissions, and statutes which give preference in public employment to veteran soldiers or sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States and honorably discharged firemen who have served in local fire departments.

The reader will find an extended note upon this topic appended to State v. Dunn, 12 Am. Dec. 25.

II. The right to a mandamus.

The writ of mandamus is not a writ of right.

Petitions for writs of mandamus are addressed to the judicial discretion of the court. Woodbury v. Piscataquis County, 40 Me. 304.

The granting of a writ of mandamus is discretionary. Hill v. Boston, 193 Mass. 569, 79 N. E. 825.

Although a return to mandamus is insufficient, yet, if it appears thereby that the relator ought not to be restored, he will not be restored. R. v. Raines, 3 Salk. 233.

A peremptory mandamus to reinstate a person in the office from which he has been removed will not be granted notwithstanding the return is defective in form, if the facts set up in the return are such as justify the court in refusing the writ as a matter of discretion. R. v. Bristol, 1 Dowl. & R. 389.

The writ of mandamus will never be granted if, when granted, it would be nugatory. State ex rel. Bland v. Rodman, 43 Mo. 256.

Nor if it would be useless. Fuller v. Brown, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 30 S. W. 506.

Nor where it cannot accomplish the purpose for which it is sought. Woodbury v. Piscataquis County, supra.

Mandamus will not lie in any case where it would be fruitless by reason of events happening subsequently to the application for it. Re Croker, 175 N. Y. 158, 67 N. E. 307.

It is said to be a well-settled rule that, whenever a writ of mandamus would be unavailing, or, if granted, fruitless, it will be refused. State ex rel. Goodnow v. Police Comrs. 80 Mo. App. 206, affirmed in 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215.

Applications of the rule referred to are found in the refusal of the writ to restore an officer illegally removed, when he can be immediately legally restored.

The writ of mandamus will not be awarded to restore to his office an officer irregularly removed in any case where the right to remove exists and can be immediately exercised upon restoration, and the irregucuted, setting up the fraud which is specifically relied upon in a defendant's motion.

Darst v. Phillips, 41 Ohio St. 514; Coates v. Chillicothe Branch State Bank, 23 Ohio St. 415; Howenstine v. Sweet, 13 Ohio C. C. 239.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, George B. Moyer, was a detective in the police department of the city of Youngstown. Charges against him of misconduct in office were filed with the defendant, Frank L. Baldwin, the mayor of the city. The relator protested against the hearing of the charges by the mayor, on the ground that the mayor was without jurisdiction. His objections were overruled, and, larly complained of avoided. People v. Chicago, 99 Ill. App. 489.

Mandamus to seat a person in an office will be refused, even on proof of his prima facie title thereto, if his title is such that, if seated, he must be ousted from his office upon a contest. State ex rel. Clarke v. Board of Health, 49 N. J. L. 349, 8 Atl. 509.

Where an officer has been illegally and improperly removed from his office, he will not be restored again by writ of mandamus if the authorities against whom the writ is asked have the power to remove him again by proceeding regularly and for just cause. Stepney's Case, 1 Bulstr. 174.

A mandamus will not be granted to restore a removed officer to his office where it would be useless on account of the right to remove again immediately upon restoration. R. v. Axbridge, 2 Cowp. 523; R. v. Bristol, supra.

A mandamus will be refused when it would be useless, as, for instance, when it is applied for to restore to his office one who has been illegally removed, although for good cause, so that immediately upon restoration he may be removed again by proceeding regularly. R. v. Griffiths, 5 Barn. & Ald. 731.

"We are not," said Best, J., in R. v. Griffiths, supra, "obliged to do so absurd a thing as to order a person to be restored to an office (however irregularly he has been removed from it) who ought to be removed again the moment that he is restored. The writ of mandamus was not intended to enable a party, by taking advantage of the want of form, to defeat justice."

If it appears that the removal or suspension of an officer was merely irregular when legal cause existed, restoration to office will not be compelled by mandamus. Ex parte Wiley, 54 Ala. 226.

The reason assigned for refusing a mandamus to restore to office one who had been irregularly removed therefrom when legal cause for his removal existed is that the writ would be useless when, on the instant of restoration, an order of removal or suspension could be legally made. Ibid.

The writ of mandamus will not be allowed to restore to his office an officer removed therefrom because of irregular or want of proper formalities in the proceedings to remove him, for the reason that, after reinstatement, he may again be removed upon precisely the same grounds by regular and formal proceedings. State ex rel. Clarke v. Board of Health, 49 N. J. L. 349, 8 Atl. 509.

A mandamus will not be granted to restore a town clerk to his office where it is acknowledged that there was sufficient cause for his removal, merely because he had been removed without notice. R. v. Axbridge, supra.

Failure to give notice to an officer of his intended suspension or removal is an irregularity merely, if cause exists to remove him; and therefore it is not sufficient in itself to warrant an issue of a writ of mandamus to restore him to office. Ex parte Wiley, supra.

But, notwithstanding an officer against whom a dismissed subordinate in the municipal service seeks a mandamus to reinstate him in his position because of the unlawful dismissal without proper reason or hearing may, immediately after reinstating him, remove him again upon charges and a trial, mandamus will not be refused, because the only presumption that can be made is that the removing officer will give such employee a fair hearing and make an honest investigation of any charges against him. Truitt v. Philadelphia, 221 Pa. 331, 70 Atl. 757.

In the case of Street v. Gallatin County, Breese (Ill.) 25, the court granted a peremptory mandamus to compel the county commissioners' court to restore to his office a clerk because the cause of his removal had not been stated upon the records of the court as required by statute. This would seem to be a case in which commissioners might at once, upon obeying the writ, have removed the clerk again by simply stating upon their records the cause of removal, and therefore a case in which, under the general rule, a mandamus ought not to issue.

after a full hearing, the mayor found that certain of the charges were sustained, and removed him from office, and certified in writing his removal and the cause thereof to the board of public safety of the city. Thereupon the relator brought a proceeding in mandamus in the court of common pleas to require the defendant to restore him to his office. The defendant answered that the relator took no appeal from the decision of the mayor to the board of public safety, and that, subsequently to the action of the mayor, the council of the city repealed the ordinance creating the office which the relator had filled, and enacted another ordinance providing for the appointment of two detectives; and that the mayor had filled these offices by appointment, and that the appointees had duly qualified and were then in office. The court of common pleas allowed a peremptory writ. The circuit court, on appeal, dismissed the petition.

The principal contention is whether mandamus is the proper remedy, and whether the mayor has authority originally to hear charges against an officer of the police department and to remove the officer in the event he finds that the charges have been sustained, or whether he may act only after the chief of police has suspended an officer and filed written charges with the mayor.

By § 6741, Rev. Stat., mandamus is defined as "a writ issued in the name of the state, to an inferior tribunal, a corporation, board, or person, commanding the performance of an act which the law specially en-

Sergeant Whitacre, having theretofore obtained a mandamus to restore him to the office of recorder of Ipswich, complained of the return by the corporation that the writ had been obeyed as insufficient because it appeared that, although he had been in fact reinstated pursuant to the writ, he had been immediately thereafter summoned to show cause why he should not be again removed for alleged misconduct, most of the acts specified being the same as stated in the former return, and that he had been displaced again in the second proceeding; but the court sustained the return, and held that the former writ had been well obeyed.

There is in Lofft, 148, a memorandum of an application for a mandamus to admit a burgess, when, upon the other side, it was offered to admit him without a mandamus, and that the court would not immediately grant a mandamus until it should appear by a refusal to admit him that a mandamus was necessary.

III. Immunity of the heads of the state.

That the writ of mandamus cannot be issued to coerce the sovereign power in a state is admitted. People ex rel. La Chicotte v. Best, 187 N. Y. 1, 116 Am. St. Rep. 586, 79 N. E. 890, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 58.

It follows, therefore, that the writ will not ordinarily lie against the executive or the legislative department of the government.

Mandamus will not lie against the President of the United States, Secretary of War, and the adjutant general of the Army to restore to his rank and position in the Army register a military officer of the United States displaced therefrom by executive orders. Ex parte Schaumburg, 1 Hayw. & H. 249, Fed. Cas. No. 12,441.

The writ of mandamus will not lie in favor of a naval officer against the Secretary of the Navy to require the restoration of such officer to the relative rank formerly held by him in the Navy, and which has been changed by order of the head of the Navy Department. United States ex rel. Hall v. Whitney, 5 Mackey, 370, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office a military officer relieved of duty by the governor of the state in his official capacity as commander in chief of the state troops. State ex rel. Higdon v. Jelks, 138 Ala. 115, 35 So. 60.

Mandamus will not lie to review the action of the governor of the state in his official capacity as commander in chief of the militia, in transferring a military officer, or in relieving him from active duty. People ex rel. Lockwood v. Scrugham, 25 Barb. 216.

A writ of mandamus to the commandant of the National Guard of the state of New York will be refused to restore a military officer relieved from duty, to his office, where the order relieving him has been approved, and an application for his reinstatement has been denied by the governor. People ex rel. Smith v. Roe, 51 App. Div. 494, 64 N. Y. Supp. 642.

An order relieving from duty a military officer, issued by his commanding officer and approved by the governor, neither deprives the officer of his office, nor subjects him to any pecuniary damage; therefore it cannot be reviewed by the civil courts. Ibid.

The judiciary has no power to interfere by a writ of mandamus with the action of the Executive Department of the government in the discharge of any public duty not purely ministerial. State ex rel. Higdon v. Jelks and United States ex rel. Hall v. Whitney, supra.

The governor of a state acting officially cannot be compelled by mandamus to perform a duty not strictly ministerial. Householder v. Morrill, 55 Kan. 317, 40 Pac. 664.

The courts of the state of New York have no power to issue a mandamus to the governor to compel him to perform any duty imposed upon him by virtue of his office, even a merely ministerial duty. People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, 156 N. Y. 136, 41 L.R.A. 231, 66 Am. St. Rep. 547, 50 N. E. 791.

An appointment to an official position in the government, even if it is simply a clerical position, is not a mere ministerial act, joins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station;" and it is contended that it is not the remedy, because nowhere does any statute specially enjoin upon the defendant, as a duty resulting from his office, the performance of the act of withdrawing his certificate of removal. The remedy by writ of mandamus did not originate with the legislature, but with the courts, and is said to have been in use as early as the thirteenth century. The Constitution of 1802 does not mention it, but power to issue the writ is specially given to the supreme court by the act of April 15, 1803, 1 Chase, Stat. p. 356, chap. 7, § 5. In Re Turner, 5 Ohio, 542, Judge Lane, speaking of the statute, says: "The occasions upon which the writ is to issue are not pointed out, and it is necessary to recur to the common law to learn in what cases the writ is properly applicable." In Universal Church v. Trustees of Section Twenty-nine, 6 Ohio, 446, 27 Am. Dec. 267, the court declined to depart from the common-law rules and practice on the writ, and it was not until the act of 1835 (Swan's Gen. Stat. 1841, chap. 86, p. 689, §§ 140 et seq.) that the practice was regulated by statute. That statute is limited to matters of practice, and did not touch the jurisdiction; and it still was necessary to recur to the common law to learn in what cases the writ might issue. So the matter stood until after the adoption of the Constitution of 1851, and until the adoption of the Civil Code.

The Constitution of 1851, art. 4, § 2, con-but one involving the exercise of judgment. The appointing power must determine the fitness of the applicant, whether or not he is a proper person to discharge the duties of the position; therefore, it is one of those acts over which the courts have no general exercising power. Keim v. United States, 177 U. S. 290, 44 L. ed. 774, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 574.

Inasmuch as the governor of the state cannot be coerced by mandamus in any case, mandamus will not lie to restore to his office a public officer who has been removed therefrom by a governmental board of which the governor of the state is a member. People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, supra.

Mandamus will not lie, directed to the Secretary of the Interior, to reinstate a clerk in his department, discharged for alleged incompetency. Keim v. United States, supra.

It has been repeatedly adjudged, said Brewer, J., writing for the court in Keim v. United States, supra, that the courts have no general supervising power over proceedings and actions of the various administrative departments of the government.

In State ex rel. Higdon v. Jelks, the court considered to some extent the question of judicial power to compel, by writ of mandamus, the discharge of a purely ministerial duty by the governor of the state, but deemed it unnecessary to decide the question for the reason that the action of which the relator complained was not ministerial.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the state senate to restore a senator to membership in any case after that body has adjourned without day. French v. Senate, 146 Cal. 604, 69 L.R.A. 556, 80 Pac. 1031, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 756.

The court, in French v. Senate, supra, plainly entertained the opinion that it had not the power to restore to his office a legislator who had been expelled by the legislative body to which he had belonged; but it was not necessary to decide the question because in that particular case the legislature had adjourned sine die, and at its next session would be a new and different body from the one before the court.

IV. When mandamus lies to reinstate ousted officer.

The writ of mandamus is an appropriate remedy to install in office one who has a clear legal title and indisputable right thereto. Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83.

One who has been wrongfully ousted from an office to which his title is clear, and who promptly applies for a mandamus to restore his office to him, is entitled to the writ if the office remains vacant. Ex parte Wiley, 54 Ala. 226; Ex parte Lusk, 82 Ala. 519, 2 So. 140; *Kennedy v. fers original jurisdiction in mandamus on the supreme court, and subsequently on the circuit court; and such jurisdiction is conferred on the court of common pleas by statute. The jurisdiction in mandamus that is conferred by the Constitution is the common-law jurisdiction as it then was exercised in this state, and it is not in the power of the legislature either to add to or take from it. The provisions of the statutes must be regarded as merely regulating the practice. They remain substantially as they were in the Code of Civil Procedure of 1853 (Swan's Rev. Stat. 1854, chap. 87, §§ 569-580). That the provisions of the Code were intended merely to relate to the practice is evident from the report of the Code commissioners. On page 228 of their report, under the chapter entitled "Proceedings upon mandamus," they say: "We found it necessary to prepare a chapter on this subject, because we have repealed the whole of the practice act in which the provisions in reference to the mandamus are to be found (Swan's Gen. Stat. 1841, chap. 86, pp. 689, 690, §§ 146-151). It will be noticed that we have amplified somewhat the sections in the old statute, but the proceeding under this chapter will be about the same as before." The statutory definition does not define the act as one enjoined by statute, but as one enjoined by law. The definition appears to have been compounded from the 14th section of the act of 1835 (Swan's Gen. Stat. 1841, chap. 86, § 150) and from Blackstone. Attention to Blackstone's defi-

The great weight of authority, said the court in Eastman v. Householder 54 Kan. 63, 37 Pac. 989, is that the courts will refuse to lend their extraordinary aid by mandamus to compel the admission of the claimant to an office in the first instance where he has never been in the actual possession of the office or discharged its duties. Where, however, one has been in the actual and lawful possession and enjoyment of the office from which he has been wrongfully removed, a different case is presented.

While the current of authority according to Brickell, Chief Justice, writing for the court in Ex parte Wiley, 54 Ala. 226, does not recognize mandamus as an appropriate office for testing a disputed title to a public office or to compel admission of a claimant in the first instance, yet, if a rightful officer, in the actual enjoyment of the office, is wrongfully removed, mandamus is generally regarded as the proper remedy to compel his restoration.

Mandamus will issue both to admit a man to an office to which he has been lawfully chosen, and to restore him to one from which he has been unlawfully removed. Howard v. Gage, 6 Mass. 462.

Mandamus is the proper remedy where a person is dispossessed of the right to execute an office, perform a service, or exercise a franchise,—especially if it is in a matter of public concern or attended with profit. R. v. Baker, 3 Burr. 1266; Fuller v. Academic School, 6 Conn. 532.

dition, and to the cases, will discover that the act which the writ directs to be performed is one that the courts determine it is the duty of the respondent to do because it appertains to his office, trust, or station; and it is specially enjoined by law when it is so determined. The purpose in defining "mandamus" was not to limit the jurisdiction, but merely to describe the writ; and it is still necessary to recur to the cases to learn the occasions when it may issue.

In many of the states mandamus is treated as a civil action; but in this state, while it has been so declared in State ex rel. Barker v. Philbrick, 69 Ohio St. 283, 69 N. E. 439, still it is treated as preserving its prerogative character. That is, it is not used for the redress of private wrongs, but only in matters relating to the public. Recurring to the cases, it will be found that, when purely a prerogative writ, it was chiefly used to enforce restitution to public officers, and to such an extent that it was then designated in the reports as the "writ of restitution." That the writ of mandamus is the appropriate remedy to restore an officer to his office, and that it will lie when there is no other adequate remedy, is laid down in the text-books without exception; and in the following cases the writ was allowed:

Chicago v. People, 210 Ill. 84, 71 N. E. 816. This was a proceeding in mandamus by a police patrolman to compel the city of Chicago and the general superintendent of police to place his name upon the roster of the police patrolmen, from which it had

When a public officer has been unlawfully ousted from his office, the proper means for him to regain it is by application for a writ of mandamus. Ransom v. Boston, 193 Mass. 337, 79 N. E. 823.

A writ of mandamus may be issued to restore to office a person ousted therefrom when he has a fair right thereto. St. Louis County Ct. v. Sparks, 10 Mo. 117, 45 Am. Dec. 355.

If an officer is wrongfully dismissed from his office without cause or a trial, he has a clear legal remedy by mandamus to compel reinstatement. Riley v. Kansas City, 31 Mo. App. 439.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to reinstate a removed officer into his office when he has a clear right thereto and has been wrongfully ousted and the title is not in dispute. State ex rel. Goodnow v. Police Comrs. 80 Mo. App. 206, affirmed in 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215.

When an applicant for a writ of mandamus is clearly an officer by legal appointment, excluded from his office without legal authority, he has a clear right to the writ to reinstate him. State ex rel. Mason v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190.

An officer who seeks restoration to an unoccupied office, having a present clear legal right thereto, is entitled to a mandamus. Lyons v. Granville County, 120 N. C. 237, 26 S. E. 929.

The general rule is that mandamus is the proper remedy, whenever a public officer has been wrongfully turned out of his office, to restore him thereto. Felts v. Memphis, 2 Head, 650.

The writ of mandamus lies to compel the admission or restoration of an applicant to any office or franchise of a public nature, whether temporal or spiritual. Dew v. Sweet Springs Dist. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 639.

At common law and in jurisdictions where the common law prevails, except so far as modified by statute, mandamus lies to compel the restoration or admission of anyone entitled to any office or franchise of a public nature, whether the same is spiritual or temporal. Bradley v. McCrabb, Dallam 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(Tex.) 504, approved and followed in Banton v. Wilson, 4 Tex. 400.

The law is well established that mandamus is the proper writ to restore a party to an office from which he has been illegally ousted. Nelson v. Edwards, 55 Tex. 380.

It is well settled that mandamus is the proper writ to restore a person to an office from which he has been illegally ousted. Johnson v. Galveston, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 469, 33 S. W. 150.

Mandamus lies to reinstate in his office a person clearly entitled thereto, who has been improperly removed. Schulbach v. Speidel, 50 W. Va. 553, 55 L.R.A. 922, 40 S. E. 424.

Mandamus lies to compel the admission or the restoration to office of a person who has a clear legal title thereto. Kline v. McKelvey, 57 W. Va. 29, 49 S. E. 896.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to restore a person to the position or the office from which he has been illegally removed. State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254.

Writs of mandamus have been granted to restore to their offices many different officials who had been unlawfully ousted. They include:

Mayors: State ex rel. Donnelly v. Teasdale, 21 Fla. 652; Milliken v. Weatherford, 54 Tex. 388, 38 Am. Rep. 629; Gillett v. People, 13 Colo. App. 553, 59 Pac. 72.

Recorders: R. v. Wells, 4 Burr. 1999; R. v. Ipswich Corp. 2 Ld. Raym. 1283; The Protector, Style, 447.

Aldermen: Doyle v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 133, 45 Am. Rep. 677; R. v. Leicester, 4 Burr. 2087; R. v. Brecknock, 1 Keble, 33; R. v. Jay, 3 Keble, 714; R. v. Taylor, 3 Salk. 231; R. v. Doncaster, Sayer, 37; Shriven's Case, 2 Strange, 832.

Common councilmen: Davenport v. Los Angeles, 146 Cal. 508, 80 Pac. 684; State ex rel. McMahon v. New Orleans, 107 La. 632, 32 So. 22; R. v. Liverpool, 2 Burr. 723; Earle's Case, Carth. 173; Williams's Case, 2 Keble, 558.

Burgesses: Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 93b; R. v. Lyme Regis, 1 Dougl. K. B. 79; R. v. Gloucester, Holt, 450; R. v. Pomfret, 10 Mod. 107; R. v. Vicars, 11 Mod. 214; R. v.

mittee, and that the clerk do not call his name among the list of members in any action, vote, or proceeding of the council, and that he be not allowed to take part in any debate on any question which may come before the board of aldermen." It was held that the council had power to expel, but not power to suspend, and that this resolution of council was equivalent to suspension; and a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed to the common council to restore the relator to the exercise of his lawful rights as an alderman and member of that body from which he had been suspended by the resolution in question.

State ex rel. Mason v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190. In this case it was held that an appointment for city treasurer by less than a majority of the whole number of aldermen was unlawful and void, and that the treasurer who had been ousted by such illegal act might be restored to his office by a writ of peremptory mandamus. It was contended that quo warranto was the proper remedy and that mandamus was not the proper remedy, because the person who had been appointed to the office was in by color of right. But the court said: "This is not the case of attempting to oust from office by mandamus a person who is in by color of right. There is no right here. The pretended appointment is a mere nullity. There was no appointing board, and those who attempted to act had no authority. The applicant here is clearly still in office by legal appointment and the effort is to oust him without legal

174 N. Y. 450, 95 Am. St. Rep. 596, 67 N. E. 78, reversing 79 App. Div. 82, 79 N. Y. Supp. 710.

In People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Police Comrs. supra, Parker, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, cited People ex rel. Hodgkinson v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616, as holding that, where the title to an office is in dispute, the proper method of trying it is by information in the nature of a quo warranto, and not by mandamus; and pronounced it a leading case on the subject, that had been cited with approval in nearly all the cases in which the question was presented, that have followed it.

In the same opinion, Chief Judge Parker also cited Re Gardner, 68 N. Y. 467, as a case in which it was said, in the course of the opinion, that it was settled at a very early period of the judicial history of the state "that, when a person is already an officer by color of right, the court will not grant a mandamus to admit another person who claims to have been duly elected; and that the proper remedy is by an information in the nature of a quo warranto. . . . This doctrine has since been approved and upheld by repeated decisions, and has become settled law."

Chief Judge Parker, in the same opinion, also cited Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 730, 5 N. E. 347, and quoted with approval the statement therein of Andrews, J., that "the courts held that they would not, at the instance of a person out of the possession of an office, try the title to the office by mandamus or other proceeding, but would leave him to his remedy by information."

When there is another incumbent in an office claimed by a public officer who applies for a reinstatement after having been removed, his remedy is not mandamus, but quo warranto. People ex rel. Baldwin v. McAdoo, 110 App. Div. 432, 96 N. Y. Supp. 362.

The proper remedy in the state of New York for a person claiming title to an office where it is held by another, even where he has been improperly removed and the other has been unlawfully appointed his successor, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is by quo warranto. People ex rel. Lazarus v. Sheehan, 128 App. Div. 743, 113 N. Y. Supp. 230.

Mandamus will not lie to restore a wrongfully removed officer to his office when it has been filled again by another person who holds it under color of right. In such case quo warranto is the proper remedy. Ellison v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 125.

He who seeks admission to an office occupied by another under color of right is not entitled to a mandamus, but must seek a remedy by an action in the nature of quo warranto. Lyon v. Granville County, 13 N. C. 237, 26 S. E. 929.

If an officer's place has been filled by a other after his exclusion, under circumstances indicating that the removal and the appointment or election of his successor were made in good faith, even if mistakenly made, mandamus will not lie to restore the former officer to his place, but he will be remitted to quo warranto. R. v. Oxford, 6 Ad. & El. 349.

As to the writ of mandamus, we have said Scott, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Ewing v. Turner, supra, two settled rules as to public offices and the effects of the belongings thereto, the one that mandamus will not lie to try title to a public office and the other that it will lie to compel predecessor to deliver to his successor the books, papers, records, money, insignia, and paraphernalia thereof when the relator shows an absolute prima facie title. The court or lawyer of to-day would for a moment controvert these two well-settled rules of modern jurisprudence.

A person who has been actually excluded from an office which he claims, in which another person has been installed, who has since discharged the duties of the office under color of law, will be refused a mandamus to restore him to office, where his removal and the appointment of his rival depend on the construction of a statute so ambiguous in its language as to render its interpretation difficult. People ex rel. Dolan Lane, 55 N. Y. 217; People ex rel. Wren Goetting, 133 N. Y. 569, 30 N. E. 968, should not prejudice the right of the relator to assert his claim for right of salary for the period intervening between his removal and restoration in any appropriate form of action, nor the right of the city of Chicago to interpose any lawful defense thereto.

Metasker v. Neally, 41 Kan. 122, 13 Am. St. Rep. 269, 21 Pac. 206. In this case the mayor of the city of Topeka suspended the city engineer and placed another in his place, and the city marshal forcibly deprived the engineer of his office room, books, papers, records, etc., and prevented him from exercising the duties of his office. A peremptory writ was allowed. In the opinion it is said that, "if the title to this office were in dispute, the action to determine it would probably be quo warranto; but it is admitted that the plaintiff was the city engineer by regular appointment, and in the actual and lawful possession and enjoyment of the office. There is no question of a contested election or disputed right to this office, except as it arises from the suspension alone. The plaintiff, up to July 3d, was the city engineer by undisputed right. Was he legally or illegally suspended? That is the sole question to be decided in this action." It was held that mandamus was the proper remedy to restore him to his office, and that, if the suspension was unauthorized, there was no vacancy to fill.

State ex rel. Tyrrell v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 536. In this case the common council resolved that "the president of council be directed not to appoint Tyrrell on any comby any court of the United States, of this state, or any other state, to imprisonment in the penitentiary, his office or place is vacated from the time of the sentence; and, if the judgment is reversed, he must be restored." This statute was held to require that the restoration be made immediately upon reversal, and hence that it may be compelled by mandamus.

F. When office is occupied under claim of right.

The writ of mandamus is the proper remedy to restore to his office a municipal officer unlawfully removed, provided the title to the office is not in dispute. Delahanty v. Warner, 75 Ill. 185, 20 Am. Rep. 237.

But, after an officer has been removed from his office, and a successor has been appointed who has entered upon the discharge of the duties, and is actually exercising the powers of such office under color of right and claim of title not demonstrably made in bad faith and wholly unfounded, the general rule is that mandamus will not lie to oust the incumbent and restore his predecessor until the right and title to the office has been settled by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.

The appropriate use of the remedies quo warranto and mandamus in cases of amotion from public office, according to the court in State, Leeds, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 52 N. J. L. 332, 8 L.R.A. 697, 19 Atl. 780, has been a fruitful source of discussion, and the result, so far as the American cases are concerned, is contrariety of judicial opinion and practice.

Mandamus will not lie to try the title to a public office. Ewing v. Turner, 2 Okla. 94, 35 Pac. 951.

It is well settled that mandamus will not lie to try a disputed title to an office, or to compel the admission of a claimant to office the title to which is in dispute, and of which he has never had the possession nor discharged the duties. Pratt v. Police & Fire Comrs. 15 Utah, 1, 49 Pac. 747.

The rule of law that mandamus will not lie to try the title to a public office is so 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) well established in our jurisdiction, said Scott, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Ewing v. Turner, supra, as to admit of no controversy.

If an office is occupied by one under color of title, mandamus will not issue to admit a different claimant to such office. State ex rel. Goodnow v. Police Comrs. 80 Mo. App. 206, affirmed in 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215.

When a person is in actual possession of an office under an election or commission, and is exercising its duties under color of right, his title thereto cannot be tried or tested on mandamus. Cripple Creek v. People, 19 Colo. App. 399, 75 Pac. 602.

Mandamus is never issued to restore a removed officer to his office when the office has been filled, and is in possession of another person under color of right. People ex rel. Lockwood v. Scrugham, 20 Barb. 302; this case was reversed in 25 Barb. 216, but the reversal left the proposition stated unaffected.

It is so well settled that mandamus will not lie to try the title to an office, said Scott, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Ewing v. Turner, supra, that the subject needs no discussion here or elsewhere.

When an office is already filled by a person holding under color of right, mandamus will not issue to remove him and admit another claimant to such office. The remedy in such a case is quo warranto. St. Louis County Ct. v. Sparks, 10 Mo. 117, 45 Am. Dec. 355; State ex rel. Bland v. Rodman, 43 Mo. 256.

When a person is in office by color of right, mandamus will not lie to admit another person claiming to have been duly elected to such office. The proper remedy in such a case is by information in the nature of a quo warranto. State ex rel. Mason v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190.

Mandamus will not lie when the title to an office is in dispute; but the proper method of trying it is by information in the nature of a quo warranto, which, since the enactment of the Code of Civil Procedure in the state of New York, is by direct action instituted by the attorney general. People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Police Comrs.

mittee, and that the clerk do not call his name among the list of members in any action, vote, or proceeding of the council, and that he be not allowed to take part in any debate on any question which may come before the board of aldermen." It was held that the council had power to expel, but not power to suspend, and that this resolution of council was equivalent to suspension; and a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed to the common council to restore the relator to the exercise of his lawful rights as an alderman and member of that body from which he had been suspended by the resolution in question.

State ex rel. Mason v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190. In this case it was held that an appointment for city treasurer by less than a majority of the whole number of aldermen was unlawful and void, and that the treasurer who had been ousted by such illegal act might be restored to his office by a writ of peremptory mandamus. It was contended that quo warranto was the proper remedy and that mandamus was not the proper remedy, because the person who had been appointed to the office was in by color of right. But the court said: "This is not the case of attempting to oust from office by mandamus a person who is in by color of right. There is no right here. The pretended appointment is a mere nullity. There was no appointing board, and those who attempted to act had no authority. The applicant here is clearly still in office by legal appointment and the effort is to oust him without legs

174 N. Y. 450, 95 Am. St. Rep. 596, 67 N. E. 78, reversing 79 App. Div. 82, 79 N. Y. Supp. 710.

In People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Police Comrs. supra, Parker, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, cited People ex rel. Hodgkinson v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616, as holding that, where the title to an office is in dispute, the proper method of trying it is by information in the nature of a quo warranto, and not by mandamus; and pronounced it a leading case on the subject, that had been cited with approval in nearly all the cases in which the question was presented, that have followed it.

In the same opinion, Chief Judge Parker also cited Re Gardner, 68 N. Y. 467, as a case in which it was said, in the course of the opinion, that it was settled at a very early period of the judicial history of the state "that, when a person is already an officer by color of right, the court will not grant a mandamus to admit another person who claims to have been duly elected; and that the proper remedy is by an information in the nature of a quo warranto. . . . This doctrine has since been approved and upheld by repeated decisions, and has become settled law."

Chief Judge Parker, in the same opinion, also cited Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 730, 5 N. E. 347, and quoted with approval the statement therein of Andrews, J., that "the courts held that they would not, at the instance of a person out of the possession of an office, try the title to the office by mandamus or other proceeding, but would leave him to his remedy by information."

When there is another incumbent in an office claimed by a public officer who applies for a reinstatement after having been removed, his remedy is not mandamus, but quo warranto. People ex rel. Baldwin v. McAdoo, 110 App. Div. 432, 96 N. Y. Supp. 382.

The proper remedy in the state of New York for a person claiming title to an office where it is held by another, even where he has been improperly removed and the other has been unlawfully appointed his successor, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is by quo warranto. People ex rel. Lazarus v. Sheehan, 128 App. Div. 743, 113 N. Y. Supp. 230.

Mandamus will not lie to restore a wrongfully removed officer to his office when it has been filled again by another person who holds it under color of right. In such case quo warranto is the proper remedy. Ellison v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 125.

He who seeks admission to an office occupied by another under color of right is not entitled to a mandamus, but must seek a remedy by an action in the nature of quo warranto. Lyon v. Granville County, 11 N. C. 237, 26 S. E. 929.

If an officer's place has been filled by another after his exclusion, under circumstances indicating that the removal and the appointment or election of his successor were made in good faith, even if mistakenly made, mandamus will not lie to restore the former officer to his place, but he will be remitted to quo warranto. R. v. Oxford, 6 Ad. & El. 349.

As to the writ of mandamus, we have said Scott, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Ewing v. Turner, supra, two settled rules as to public offices and the effects of the belongings thereto, the one that mandamus will not lie to try title to a public office and the other that it will lie to compel predecessor to deliver to his successor the books, papers, records, money, insignia, and paraphernalia thereof when the relator shows an absolute prima facie title. The court or lawyer of to-day would for a moment controvert these two well-settled rules of modern jurisprudence.

A person who has been actually excluded from an office which he claims, in which another person has been installed, who has ever since discharged the duties of the office under color of law, will be refused a mandamus to restore him to office, where his removal and the appointment of his rival depend on the construction of a statute so ambiguous in its language as to render its interpretation difficult. People ex rel. Dolan Lane, 55 N. Y. 217; People ex rel. Wren Goetting, 133 N. Y. 569, 30 N. E. 968, authority. He has a right to this remedy by mandamus."

State, Leeds, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 52 N. J. L. 332, 8 L.R.A. 697, 19 Atl. 780. In this case it is held that, "where a mandamus is applied for to compel a corporation to restore relator to an office to which he is prima facie entitled, the incumbent is not a necessary party to the allowance of a peremptory mandamus."

Com. ex rel. O'Brien v. Gibbons, 196 Pa. 97, 46 Atl. 313: "Where there is no contest as to a school director's original title to his seat under a valid election, but only as to the legality of his ouster for alleged wilful absence from meetings, the remedy of the director is mandamus to prevent his further unlawful exclusion. The remedy by quo warranto against the person chosen to succeed him does not apply." In the opinion it is said: "There is no contest as to the relator's original title to his seat under a valid election, but only as to the legality of his ouster. If this was not valid, he never has been ousted at all, and mandamus is the proper remedy to prevent his further unlawful exclusion. We have nothing to do with the title of his alleged successor, who was apparently elected by the board to fill a vacancy that did not exist. This cannot affect the relator. He was admittedly elected to the office, has never been out of it in contemplation of law, and the mandamus simply compels the respondents to recognize his established right."

firming 29 N. Y. S. R. 286, 8 N. Y. Supp. 742.

Where a clerk of a parish has been removed from his office by the judge of the district court, and compelled to surrender the records and papers of his office to a successor appointed to said office, a mandamus will not lie to restore him when the successor is actually filling his place; but he will be relegated to his remedy in the nature of quo warranto. State v. Dunlap, 5 Mart. (La.) 271.

The Louisiana supreme court, in State v. Dunlap, supra, in refusing a mandamus to a clerk of a parish who alleged that he had been removed by the district judge and compelled by force to surrender the records and papers of his office to a successor appointed by said judge, who had been made a party to the proceeding, said: "The clerk cannot be considered as removed, for this court alone has power of removing him. The facts sworn to present only a case of disturbance. If it does really exist, the deponent has his remedy in the ordinary course of justice, by an action for damages, and the intruder may be ousted by a writ of quo warranto. It is true, in a case like the present, an officer is commonly reinstated by a writ of mandamus. But it cannot be believed that, if the present incumbent be declared by a proper judgment to have been illegally placed in an office which was not vacant, the court of the seventh district will prevent the defendant from acting. Were we to proceed in a summary mode, by the process of mandamus, we would take original cognizance, in an extraordinary manner, of a right to office, contested by two persons,—a right which may effectually, though less speedily, be asserted in the ordinary course of justice. The rule must be discharged."

The reason why mandamus will not issue to admit to an office a person claiming title thereto, when it is also claimed by another under color of right, is because the adverse claimant has no opportunity to be heard in defense of his right. State ex rel. Clarke v. Board of Health, 49 N. J. L. 349, 8 Atl. 509.

title to an office from which the applicant for mandamus has been removed and of which another party is possessed, mandamus ought not to be granted because the incumbent of the office has no opportunity to be heard. People ex rel. Dolan v. Lane and People ex rel. Wren v. Goetting, supra.

In the opinion of the court, Parker, Ch. J., writing, in People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Police Comrs. 174 N. Y. 450, 95 Am. St. Rep. 596, 67 N. E. 78, reversing 79 App. Div. 82, 79 N. Y. Supp. 710, approval was given to the language of Gray, J., in People ex rel. Wren v. Goetting, supra, in which he said: "There is, however, this insuperable objection to the maintenance of this proceeding by the appellant: That mandamus is not the proper remedy in such a case. The office claimed is filled by another person, holding under color of right, and the question of the title to the office turns upon the construction of statutory provisions. It would be highly inappropriate to determine such a question in a mandamus proceeding. The appropriate remedy, and an adequate one, is by information in the nature of quo warranto, in which proceeding the incumbent of the office can be heard in his own behalf upon the disputed question. The rule must be regarded as well established by frequent decisions in the courts of this state that the writ of mandamus should be refused to aid the admission of a claimant into an office, already filled under color of law, and when the title to it presents a disputable question."

High, in his work on Extraordinary Remedies (§ 49), considers such a rule to be 'established by an overwhelming current of authority.'

Usually a title to a public office will not be settled in mandamus proceedings; but, when a person is in office de jure and de facto, and is interfered with by one plainly without title, mandamus is the proper remedy to settle the title. Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399, 47 N. W. 753.

Although in most cases quo warranto is the proper and appropriate remedy to test the right to hold an office, the exigencies of a particular case, and the public necessity, may often require a more speedy determina-

49 Pac. 747. In this case the chief of police of the city of Salt Lake had been removed from office by the board of police and fire commissioners, and another person had been appointed in his place, and had taken possession and was discharging the duties of the office. It was held that the board had no authority to dismiss him without charges and without a hearing; and that, "where a person has been in the actual and lawful possession of an office, received and enjoyed the emoluments thereof, is entitled to the office de jure, and is unlawfully removed, mandamus is the appropriate remedy to restore the de jure officer to his office, and it is not necessary to resort to quo warranto, even though the office be in the possession of another."

Schmubach v. Speidel, 50 W. Va. 553, 55 L.R.A. 922, 40 S. E. 424: "Mandamus lies to correct an improper amotion from office. and to restore to the full enjoyment of his franchise a person who has been improperly deprived thereof; and, when one has been wrongfully deprived of his office by the illegal appointment of another, the writ lies to compel his restoration though the person appointed in his stead be in possession de facto."

State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254. In this case a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed to restore the relator to the office of superintendent of schools from which he had been improperly removed. Held, "mandamus is the proper remedy to restore a party to the possession of an of-tion of the controversy; and, when such is the case, resort may be had to mandamus. Ibid.

Where the relator's title to an office from which he had been excluded was in dispute, but was established by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction after a contest in the nature of quo warranto, mandamus lies to admit him to the office notwithstanding it is filled de facto by the rival claimant who was defeated in the antecedent proceedings. State, Leeds, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 52 N. J. L. 332, 8 L.R.A. 697, 19 Atl. 780.

In Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83, the court held that a writ of mandamus might issue to put an officer in possession of an office to which he had been duly elected or appointed, notwithstanding he had not filled it before, and it was in possession of another person claiming title to it; and this ruling was made upon the ground that quo warranto, or an information in that nature, did not afford an adequate and complete legal remedy, because it would merely determine the title without necessarily giving possession of the office.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to admit to an office a person having a clear legal right thereto when there is no disputed question of fact and his title depends altogether upon pertinent, statutory, and constitutional provisions of law, notwithstanding another person has actual possession of the office, since the latter has neither color of right thereto, nor is he an officer de facto. People ex rel. Howard v. Erie County, 42 App. Div. 510, 59 N. Y. Supp. 476, affirming 26 Misc. 233, 56 N. Y. Supp. 318.

When a person has had actual and lawful possession of an office, and has a clear legal title to it, and has been unlawfully removed from it, mandamus is an appropriate remedy to restore him to his office; and it is not necessary to resort to quo warranto, even though the office is in possession of another person. Pratt v. Police & Fire Comrs. 15 Utah, 1, 49 Pac. 747.

When a municipal officer having a clear legal title to his office is illegally ousted, and another unlawfully appointed to serve in his place, a writ of mandamus to reinstate him is a proper and appropriate remedy, notwithstanding the office is in actual possession of his illegally appointed successor. Schmubach v. Speidel, 50 W. Va. 553, 55 L.R.A. 922, 40 S. E. 424.

It has often been judicially declared, said the court in Kline v. McKelvey, 57 W. Va. 29, 49 S. E. 896, that mandamus is a proper remedy for the trial of a title to office, and will lie where there is no other appropriate remedy, because it is more speedy and therefore a more adequate remedy; but it has often, on the contrary, been more generally declared that mandamus is not the proper remedy for the trial of a title to office. For the purposes of this case, it suffices to say that the writ of mandamus is the proper remedy for the admission or restoration to office of one who holds a clear legal prima facie right to it. Upon this proposition all the authorities agree; no case decided by this court seems to stop short of it.

As it did not appear in the case of State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254, that any other person had been appointed to fill the office to which the relator sought to be restored by mandamus, the question whether he would be bound to proceed by quo warranto in the first instance the court did not deem it necessary to determine.

In the case of People ex rel. McLaughlin v. Police Comrs. supra, reference was made by Parker, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, to dicta in several cases suggesting an exception to the general rule that mandamus will not lie where someone is actually in possession of the office under color of right, namely, except where there is no serious question as to the title to the office; and it was said that such exceptions, if once created, would destroy the rule itself, and render uncertain that which is now certain. In every one of those cases, said the chief judge, the court held that mandamus would not lie. That was the point of each decision, and nothing else would decide it. The fact that, in addition to so deciding, the court in several cases in the course of its argument made use of the expression that a writ of mandamus would not issue where there from which he has been illegally removed." In the opinion it is said: "But it is objected in the return that the council cannot restore the relator because they have not the power of appointment, but that this power belongs to the school commissioners. But clearly it is not an appointment that the relator seeks, or is entitled to, if he has been illegally removed. If it was to be an appointment by the appointing power, it is very certain that this court could not control its discretion or compel it to appoint any particular person. But this proceeding is based on an entirely different theory. Its claim is that the relator does not need any appointment, but that his title is and has been complete and perfect to the office all the time, and he asks that the council which has, without authority, removed him from that to which he is entitled, shall retrace its illegal steps, vacate its proceedings, and remove the obstacles which it has unlawfully placed in his way. He does not ask them to appoint him, but, by vacating their unauthorized proceedings against him, to restore him to that to which he is already appointed. Their return that the power of appointment belongs to the school commissioners is no answer to this demand. The demurrer is sustained, and the premptory writ awarded."

But it is contended that the relator has a remedy by injunction, and that a remedy in equity is a remedy in the ordinary course of the law within the inhibition of § 6744, Rev. Stat., that "the writ must not be issued in was a serious question in regard to the title, is not entitled to affect the decision where it is not necessary to the decision, and the expression is clearly obiter.

At an early period it was established, according to the court in State, Leeds, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, supra, by the court of King's bench, that quo warranto, and not mandamus, is the proper remedy when an office is full de facto; and it is likewise to be gathered from the English cases that an office is deemed full de facto whenever a person elected has been admitted to it, whether the election was or was not of such a character that it could be supported at law. But, while it is true that the illegality of the election by virtue of which an incumbent has gained entrance to an office does not prevent the office from being full of him de facto, it is also to be noted that from the earliest periods it has been held requisite that the illegality in question must be consistent with honesty of purpose. Elections based upon mistakes of fact or misconceptions of law may impart a color of right which will bar the allowance of a mandamus, but palpable disregard of law renders the action by which an office is seized merely colorable, and in a clear case will be brushed aside as affording no obstruction to the exercise of a plain legal duty. The distinction thus early indicated has become incorporated in the modern English rule upon this subject, which is stated by Mr. Shortt (Mandamus, 122).

In this country, the courts of New York are said, in State, Leeds, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, supra, to have adopted the English rule without substantial change, and that a similar course has been followed in Connecticut; but that other state courts, on the contrary, notably those of Massachusetts, have relaxed the rigidity of the English rule, and, to a certain extent, permit the right to an office actually filled to be tried upon an alternative mandamus. In this state, continued the court, so far as any expression of judicial sentiment is to be found, it is favorable to retain the distinction upon which the English rule is founded; that is, that quo warranto, and not mandamus, is the remedy in all cases in which an office is full de facto, excepting only those cases in which the office has been filled by proceedings palpably without legal warrant. That that rule, in its rigidity, is applicable only to cases in which a relator clearly out of office de facto is seeking to oust an incumbent who is clearly in. In such cases the reason for the rule makes the fullness of the office de facto the test as to whether quo warranto is or is not the only remedy.

There is, however, a class of cases in which this reason for the rule is wanting. It is those cases in which the facts before the court, or within its judicial knowledge, show that the relator was in office de jure et de facto, and that the defendant, while claiming to be in de facto, can make no claim to be in de jure. Here the relator is not called upon to test the title to the office, for that is not in dispute. The office is not de facto full against him, unless by his conduct he elects to consider himself out. In contemplation of law, his title to the office de jure draws to it the possession de facto, as in cases where simultaneous acts of occupancy are exercised by contestants over a legal title. In such cases there is nothing to be tried by quo warranto. The law being settled, and the facts undisputed, the duty of the court is clear.

The rule that, upon the application for a mandamus, of a person out of possession of an office filled by another, the writ will be refused and such person will be left to his remedy by quo warranto, does not apply to clerks or employees in public office who have been unlawfully removed from their position by their superiors. People ex rel. Drake v. Sutton, 88 Hun, 173, 34 N. Y. Supp. 487.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to reinstate in his office a clerk of a county court improperly removed therefrom, although his successor has been appointed. Hardin County Ct. v. Hardin, Peck (Tenn.) 291.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office a clerk of a district court having a clear legal title thereto and unlawfully ousted therefrom, notwithstanding another person has been appointed to, and is filling, the office a case where there is a plain and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law." Freon v. Carriage Co. 42 Ohio St. 30, 51 Am. Rep. 794; State ex rel. Bross v. Carpenter, 51 Ohio St. 83, 46 Am. St. Rep. 556, 37 N. E. 261; Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 48 L.R.A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707, 56 N. E. 1033. The allowance of the writ always was in the discretion of the court, and its discretion sometimes was controlled by the existence of a remedy in equity; but, respecting the jurisdiction of the court, such a remedy never was a remedy at law. However, § 2, art. 14. of the Constitution, provides for the abolition of the distinct forms of action at law, and for the administration of justice by a uniform mode of proceeding, without reference to any distinction between law and equity; and, if there is a remedy under the Code, it is in the ordinary course of the law. But there is no such remedy in equity. In the opinion in Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 210, 31 L. ed. 402, 405, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482, 487, Mr. Justice Gray reviews the authorities, and says: "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property. It has no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment, or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors, or over the appointment and removal of public officers. To assume such a jurisdiction, or to sustain a bill in equity to restrain or relieve against proceedings for the punishment of offenses, or for the removal of public officers,

The writ of mandamus is the proper remedy to restore an illegally ousted clerk of a district court to his office, although another person has been appointed in his place. Dew v. Sweet Springs Dist. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 639.

When an employee in a municipal or county office, as distinguished from a public officer,—that is, from the incumbent of an office created by the people or the legislature,—is removed from his position, he may test his right to be reinstated in an application for a mandamus, notwithstanding another person has been appointed in his place and is performing the duties and receiving the salary attached thereto. People ex rel. O'Toole v. Hamilton, 98 App. Div. 59, 90 N. Y. Supp. 547, affirming 44 Misc. 577, 90 N. Y. Supp. 97; People ex rel. Corkhill v. McAdoo, 98 App. Div. 312, 90 N. Y. Supp. 689.

A municipal employee, as distinguished from a municipal officer, is entitled to the remedy by mandamus to reinstate him in an office from which he has been unlawfully removed, notwithstanding the office is held by another person. But a municipal officer,—that is, one charged with the performance of original, independent, or governmental duties as contradistinguished from a mere employment,—if wrongfully removed from his office, must resort for reinstatement, when another person is an occupant thereof claiming under color of right, to quo warranto; and is not entitled to mandamus. People ex rel. Hoeffe v. Cahill, 188 N. Y. 489, 81 N. E. 453, reversing 116 App. Div. 885, 102 N. Y. Supp. 325.

It is no defense to the application of a police officer who has been wrongfully removed, for a mandamus to reinstate him, that another person has been appointed to and is filling the relator's place. People ex rel. Beaty v. Board of Police, 9 Abb. Pr. 257.

Mandamus is properly refused to reinstate a city employee when another is holding his position under color of right, and when the illegality of his removal is not clear, but 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

depends upon questions of statutory construction which are doubtful. Re Hardy, 17 Misc. 667, 41 N. Y. Supp. 469; People ex rel. Brymer v. Scannel, 22 Misc. 298, 49 N. Y. Supp. 1096.

VI. Basic requirements.

a. Clear legal right to office.

The writ of mandamus will not issue unless there is a clear and specific legal right to be enforced by it. Swartz v. Large, 47 Kan. 304, 27 Pac. 993.

To entitle a removed officer to restoration to his office by writ of mandamus upon the ground that he has been illegally removed therefrom, he is bound to show that, prior to his removal, he was lawfully an incumbent of such office by a clear legal title. Stott v. Chicago, 205 Ill. 281, 68 N. E. 736, affirming 98 Ill. App. 105; Moon v. Champaign, 214 Ill. 40, 73 N. E. 408; Kenneally v. Chicago, 220 Ill. 485, 77 N. E. 155.

That he was eligible, and had a constitutional right to exercise the powers and discharge the duties of the office. Jefferson County Justices v. Clarke, 1 T. B. Mon. 82; Spencer County Justices v. Harcourt, 4 B. Mon. 499.

He is bound to show at least a prima facie title to the office he claims. State ex rel. McDermott v. Kenny, 45 N. J. L. 251; State ex rel. Clarke v. Board of Health, 49 N. J. L. 349, 8 Atl. 509.

He must show affirmatively a clear legal right to immediate possession of the office. People ex rel. Dolan v. Lane, 55 N. Y. 217; People ex rel. Wren v. Goetting, 133 N. Y. 569, 30 N. E. 968, affirming 29 N. Y. S. R. 286, 8 N. Y. Supp. 742.

If he was summarily removed without notice or opportunity to be heard, it must appear that his removal was in violation of some statute law having application to his office at the time of his removal. People ex rel. Terry v. Keller, 158 N. Y. 187, 52 N. E. 1107.

To entitle a removed officer to reinstatement by mandamus in the office from which he had been removed, on the ground that his is to invade the domain of the courts of common law, or of the executive and administrative department of the government."

In Reemelin v. Mosby, 47 Ohio St. 570, 26 N. E. 717, it is held: "The remedy by injunction may be employed by the incumbent of a public office to protect his possession against the interference of an adverse claimant whose title is in dispute, until the latter shall establish his title at law; but it is not the appropriate remedy to try the title to a public office, or determine questions concerning the authority to make appointments thereto."

In Harding v. Eichinger, 57 Ohio St. 371, 49 N. E. 306, Eichinger averred that he was elected a member of the board of education of the city of Mansfield, and that he duly qualified, but that, on the night the members met to organize, Harding intruded into the office and usurped his (Eichinger's) place, and excluded and forcibly prevented him from performing the duties of the office. The court of common pleas granted an injunction, against Harding, and, on appeal, the circuit court did the same. Held, "injunction will not lie at the suit of a claimant to a public office who is out of possession, against an adverse claimant who is in possession."

Moyer is out of possession, and he has no adequate remedy at law. A suit for his salary is not an adequate remedy, because that does not restore him to the office, and the public is interested in having official duties performed by those whose duty it is to removal was without charges and a hearing, he must be within the protection of some statute law forbidding such a removal. People ex rel. Cochrane v. Tracy, 35 App. Div. 265, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1070.

It must clearly appear that he was illegally removed, and that he has an indisputable right to reoccupy the office. Kimball v. Olmsted, 20 Wash. 629, 56 Pac. 377.

It is not sufficient, in an application for a writ of mandamus to restore an illegally removed officer to his office, simply to set forth the legal conclusion that the removal was unauthorized and without justification; but it is necessary to aver the exact facts in regard to the removal. Chicago v. People, 210 Ill. 84, 71 N. E. 816.

To entitle a removed officer to a mandamus to restore him to office, the illegality of his removal must be clearly and indisputably established. People ex rel. Warschauer v. Dalton, 159 N. Y. 235, 53 N. E. 1113, affirming 34 App. Div. 302, 54 N. Y. Supp. 216.

To entitle an employee to reinstatement in an office from which he has been unlawfully removed, he is bound to show affirmatively the invasion or denial of some of his substantial rights in the proceedings which ended in his removal. People ex rel. Holden v. Woodbury, 88 App. Div. 593, 85 N. Y. Supp. 161, affirmed in 179 N. Y. 525, 71 N. E. 1137.

A mandamus is not the proper remedy to procure the reinstatement of one alleged to have been illegally removed from his office, when the legality of the removal is a disputed question depending upon the construction of pertinent statutes. Kimball v. Olmsted, supra.

Mandamus to reinstate a court attendant is properly denied when he cannot show a clear legal right to the office. Re Torney, 11 Misc. 291, 32 N. Y. Supp. 277, affirming 7 Misc. 260, 27 N. Y. Supp. 913.

An officer who was summarily removed from his position cannot be restored thereby by mandamus when it is made to appear that he was appointed to the office in the first instance in violation of law, and held it unlawfully at the time of his removal. L.R.A. (N.S.)

removal. People ex rel. Lee v. Gleason, 32 App. Div. 357, 53 N. Y. Supp. 7.

One who seeks restoration by writ of mandamus to an office from which he alleges he has been illegally removed must show affirmatively the legal existence of the office itself when it is one not known to the common law. Moon v. Champaign and Kennealy v. Chicago, supra.

A subordinate officer who was removed from his position in violation of the New York civil service act (Laws 1898, chap. 186) is bound affirmatively to show in his application for the writ of mandamus, to entitle him to such writ, that the position from which he was removed was, at the time of his removal, in the competitive class. People ex rel. Warschauer v. Dalton, supra.

To entitle a veteran of the Civil War, who was discharged from public employment without notice and hearing, to a mandamus to restore him to office, he must affirmatively show that the removing officer had notice that he was a veteran and refused to accord him a hearing notwithstanding. People ex rel. O'Brien v. Cruger, 12 App. Div. 536, 42 N. Y. Supp. 398.

One who claims the benefit of a statute giving him the preference in public employment, and forbidding his removal without cause and hearing, as an honorably discharged veteran of the Civil War, is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him to a position from which he has been removed, without previously bringing home to the knowledge of the removing officer the fact that he is a veteran, and claiming his privileges as such, with a demand that he be reinstated for that reason. People ex rel. McDonald v. Clausen, 50 App. Div. 286, 63 N. Y. Supp. 993; People ex rel. Bean v. Clausen, 50 App. Div. 324, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1064.

A veteran entitled by statute to preference in public employment and forbidden by law to be removed therefrom without charges, notice, and the opportunity to be heard, if removed arbitrarily in violation of such law, must show, before mandamus will issue to reinstate him, that the officer who removed him had notice of his rights, and refused his demand to be reinstated. Re perform them, and, if they are ousted without authority, it is in the public interest and conducive to peace and good government that they shall be speedily restored by a mandamus. The only other remedy suggested is that of appeal to the board of public safety. But, if the mayor was without jurisdiction to hear the charges, his action was void, and the relator was not required to pursue that course.

This brings us to the question on the merits of the case, and that is, whether the mayor has authority originally to hear charges against an officer in the police department, and to remove the officer in the event he finds that the charges have been sustained, or whether he may act only after the chief of police has suspended the officer and filed written charges with the mayor.

Stutzbach, 62 App. Div. 219, 70 N. Y. Supp. 901, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 416, 61 N. E. 697; People ex rel. Goetchious v. Follett, 24 Misc. 510, 53 N. Y. Supp. 956.

If a municipal employee who applies for a mandamus to restore him to his position grounds his application upon a statute which forbids the arbitrary removal without charges of persons in a class to which he belongs, he is bound to show affirmatively that he is one of the persons protected by the statute. People ex rel. Fogarty v. Cassidy, 118 App. Div. 693, 103 N. Y. Supp. 671.

The fact that the relator's name was carried upon the pay rolls and certified by the civil service commissioners after the adoption of the civil service statute is not sufficient proof, upon application for a mandamus to restore him to the office from which he has been removed, of the prior legal existence of such office. Kenneally v. Chicago, supra.

b. Undisputed facts.

The object to be accomplished by a writ of mandamus is not to determine controversies; but simply to enforce a clear, specific, legal right, when such right depends only upon questions of law. People ex rel. Hoyt v. Ballston Spa, 19 Misc. 671, 44 N. Y. Supp. 471.

If the facts entitle a relator to reinstatement in an office of public employment from which he has been removed, mandamus is a legitimate and proper remedy. State ex rel. Stephens v. Pilotage Comrs. 23 S. C. 175; State ex rel. McDonald v. Courtenay, 23 S. C. 180.

The writ of mandamus to admit or restore an officer to his office issues only where, upon the return, facts are admitted, and only the question of law is involved. Howard v. Gage, 6 Mass. 462.

Mandamus will not issue to restore a removed officer to his office where the material question of facts is in dispute. Re Kenny, 52 App. Div. 385, 65 N. Y. Supp. 204, affirming 27 Misc. 680, 59 N. Y. Supp. 555. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Section 147 of the new Municipal Code (90 Ohio Laws, p. 69), Rev. Stat. §§ 1536-683 provides that all power and duties connected with and incident to the appointment, regulation, and government of the police and fire departments of the city shall be vested in the mayor and the board of public safety as thereafter provided, and that the mayor shall be the chief conservator of the peace within the limits of the corporation. Section 148, Rev. Stat. § 1536-684, provides that the chief of police shall be the executive head of the department, under the direction of the mayor; provided, that the chief shall have exclusive control of the stationing and transfer of all patrolmen and other officers and employees in the department, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of public safety.

When, upon an application for a mandamus to reinstate a person removed from his position in the municipal service, an issue of fact is made upon material questions, peremptory mandamus cannot issue. People ex rel. Shay, 39 N. Y. S. R. 856, 15 N. Y. Supp. 488.

When, upon an application for a mandamus to restore a removed officer to his office material facts upon which the relator's right depends are denied, a peremptory writ must be refused. People ex rel. Hoyt v. Ballston Spa, supra.

Mandamus to restore one unlawfully excluded from his office should be refused where there is a dispute as to material facts upon which his right to reinstatement or the unlawfulness of his removal depends. Adam v. Duffield, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 9.

If a sufficient return is made to a mandamus, a writ of restoration will not be awarded, even though the return is false, but the party aggrieved will be remitted to his action. Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 93b; Efield v. Hills, 3 Keble, 859.

A dispute over matters merely immaterial does not require the refusal of a writ of mandamus to reinstate in his office an officer who has been wrongfully removed. Stutzbach v. Coler, 62 App. Div. 219, 70 N. Y. Supp. 901.

Upon an application for a mandamus to reinstate a person wrongfully removed from his office as a policeman, the material facts are not put in issue by denials and affirmations made upon information and belief. Re Elder, 118 App. Div. 25, 103 N. Y. Supp. 617, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 509, 81 N. E. 116.

To justify the refusal of a peremptory writ of mandamus to restore an officer to his office from which he has been removed, the return must be an honest dispute as to the material facts involved. Sullivan v. Gilroy, 55 Hu. 285, 8 N. Y. Supp. 401.

c. Lack of other adequate remedy.

It is a rule of general application that where there is another specific legal remedy for the complaining party, a writ of mandamus will not issue.

Section 152, Rev. Stat. § 1536-688, is as follows: "The chief of the police and the chief of the fire department shall have exclusive right to suspend any of the deputies, officers, or employees in his respective department and under his management and control, for incompetence, gross neglect of duty, gross immorality, habitual drunkenness, failure to obey orders given him by the proper authority, or for any other reasonable and just cause. If any such employee be suspended as herein provided, the said chief of police, or the chief of the fire department, as the case may be, shall forthwith, in writing, certify such fact, together with the cause of such suspension, to the mayor, who shall, within five days from the receipt of the same, proceed to inquire into the cause of such suspension and render his judgment thereon, and his judgment in the matter shall be final, except as otherwise provided in this act. The mayor shall have the exclusive right to suspend the chief of the police department or the chief of the fire department for incompetence, gross neglect of duty, gross immorality, habitual drunkenness, failure to obey orders given by the proper authority, or for any other reasonable and just cause. In the event that either the said chief of police or chief of the fire department shall be suspended as herein provided, it shall be the duty of the mayor to forthwith certify such fact, together with the cause of such suspension, to the board of public safety, which shall within five days from and after the date of the receipt of such notice proceed to hear said charges and mus will not lie. Cripple Creek v. People, 19 Colo. App. 399, 75 Pac. 603.

Mandamus will not lie to invest a claimant to an office with title and possession thereto when he has another adequate and appropriate remedy by information in the nature of a quo warranto. Bonner v. State, 7 Ga. 480.

Mandamus cannot be awarded when there is another specific and adequate legal remedy. Swartz v. Large, 47 Kan. 304, 27 Pac. 993.

Mandamus will not lie if there is another specific and adequate legal remedy available to him who applies for the writ. Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83.

Mandamus will not issue to restore a person to an office from which he has been unlawfully removed, where he has another appropriate, adequate remedy, although less speedy. People ex rel. Lazarus v. Sheehan, 128 App. Div. 743, 113 N. Y. Supp. 230.

Mandamus will not lie to reinstate a removed officer in his office when he has an ample and effectual remedy by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto against his successor, the actual incumbent. Ellison v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 125.

A writ of mandamus will not issue to restore an officer to his office after his removal, in a case where there exists an adequate remedy at law which the applicant has not invoked or exhausted. State ex rel. Aucoin v. Police Comrs. 113 La. 424, 37 So. 16; State ex rel. Journee v. Police Comrs. 119 La. 515, 44 So. 283.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his position a subordinate employee of a public board when he has a complete, plain, and adequate remedy at law. Board of Education v. State, 100 Wis. 455, 76 N. W. 351.

But the writ of mandamus issues to restore to office an officer illegally removed therefrom by his superiors, whenever he has no other appropriate and adequate remedy at law to obtain his restoration. Miles v. Stevenson, 80 Md. 358, 30 Atl. 646.

If a party has no other remedy which is complete and adequate to restore him to the office from which he has been illegally removed, mandamus will lie, although he may have a remedy not so well adapted to the end sought. Dew v. Sweet Springs Dist. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 639.

Mandamus to restore to his office an unlawfully removed officer issues both in those cases in which the applicant has no other legal remedy, and where any other modes of redress are tedious or inadequate to afford relief. Bradley v. McCrabb, Dallam (Tex.) 504.

Mandamus to restore to office an officer who has been illegally removed therefrom, and who has a clear and legal right thereto, will not be refused because he has other legal remedies, if such remedies are not plain, adequate, and complete. Ransom v. Boston, 193 Mass. 537, 79 N. E. 823.

In White's Case, 2 Ld. Raym. 959, upon an application for a mandamus to restore a clerk of a chartered company, Chief Justice Holt remarked that in such cases a mandamus had been granted, but that he was of the opinion that no mandamus ought to be granted where the officer may have an assize; afterwards, however, in 2 Ld. Raym. 1004, the mandamus was granted on the ground that it was the same case as that of the town clerk.

The bringing and prosecution of an action at law inadequate to afford the desired relief to an applicant for a mandamus to restore him to his office does not bar the remedy. Hill v. Boston, 193 Mass. 569, 79 N. E. 825.

The fact that an officer illegally removed from his office has brought an action for the salary attached thereto for the period which has elapsed since his removal is no bar to his application for a writ of mandamus to restore him to office. Ransom v. Boston, supra.

Mandamus is still the proper remedy to reinstate in his office a clerk of a county court who has been improperly removed, notwithstanding he also has the remedy by writ of error to review in the circuit court an order or judgment for removal. Hardin County Ct. v. Hardin, Peck (Tenn.) 291; also Sevier v. Washington County Justices, Peck render its judgment thereon, which shall be final."

Section 186, Rev. Stat. § 1536-722, is as follows: "Any person in the department of public safety in any city, who shall be removed from his position of employment or appointment by the mayor, shall have the right to appeal from the decision of such officer, to the board of public safety within ten days from and after the date of his removal, and said board of public safety shall hear said appeal within ten days from and after the filing of the same with it, and its judgment in the matter shall be final."

Section 167, Rev. Stat. § 1536-703, is as follows: "No officer or employee in the department of public safety shall be removed or discharged except for cause; and the cause of removal of any person shall be forthwith stated in writing by the mayor to the board, and shall be filed by the said board in its office, and shall be open to public inspection."

Prior to the adoption of the new Municipal Code, the mayor had power to suspend policemen or any officer appointed by him; but the power of removal was vested in the city council. Rev. Stat. § 1749. Under the new Code the powers of council are legislative only, and this section, giving the mayor power of suspension and the council power of removal, was repealed. However, § 1747 Rev. Stat. (now § 1536-638), provided: "He shall supervise the conduct of all the officers of the corporation, inquire into and examine the grounds of all reasonable complaint

d. Diligence.

If an officer who has been ousted without warrant of law and for no sufficient cause from an office which he had a legal right to hold, and is entitled, upon undisputed facts and law, to reoccupy, neglects to apply promptly for a mandamus to restore him to such office, and delays without sufficient excuse or explanation to seek the remedy, the writ will be refused because of laches. Chicago v. People, 210 Ill. 84, 71 N. E. 816; Eastman v. Householder, 54 Kan. 63, 37 Pac. 989; State ex rel. McCabe v. Police Board, 107 La. 162, 31 So. 662; Streeter v. Worcester, 177 Mass. 29, 58 N. E. 277; Hill v. Boston, 193 Mass. 509, 79 N. E. 825; People ex rel. Vanderhoof v. Palmer, 3 App. Div. 389, 38 N. Y. Supp. 651.

No precise definition can be formulated as to what is sufficient to constitute laches in applying for a writ of mandamus; but every case must depend upon its own particular circumstances. Hill v. Boston, supra.

The laches of the relator in not applying for a writ of mandamus to restore him to an office from which he has been illegally removed will bar the writ,—especially when he has slept upon his rights for a length of time equal to the statute of limitations in analogous cases. Jones v. Police Comrs. 141 Cal. 96, 74 Pac. 696; Dodge v. Police Comrs. 1 Cal. App. 608, 82 Pac. 699; Harby v. Board of Education, 2 Cal. App. 418, 83 Pac. 1081; Hill v. Boston, supra.

Inexcusable delay for several years, in a removed officer, to apply for mandamus to reinstate him in his office, requires a refusal. People ex rel. Steinson v. Board of Education, 158 N. Y. 125, 52 N. E. 722, affirming 20 App. Div. 452, 46 N. Y. Supp. 782.

An application for a mandamus to reinstate a discharged municipal employee must be refused on the ground of laches when there is a delay of more than three years in making the application for it. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

People ex rel. Harper v. Adams, 46 N. Y. S. R. 150, 18 N. Y. Supp. 896.

A delay of three years by a veteran soldier applying for a mandamus to compel his restoration to a place in the municipal department from which he was removed arbitrarily without a hearing is such laches as to preclude the granting of the writ. People ex rel. Throckmorton v. McCartney, 28 App. Div. 138, 50 N. Y. Supp. 919.

A delay of two and one half years in applying for a writ of mandamus to restore to his office an officer who has been wrongfully removed therefrom constitutes such laches as warrants a refusal of the writ. Re Galney, 84 Hun, 503, 32 N. Y. Supp. 303; Murphy, 61 App. Div. 145, 70 N. Y. Supp. 405.

Advice of counsel which appears to have been unsound or inapplicable is not sufficient excuse for a delay of more than two years in applying for a writ of mandamus to reinstate a removed officer; and in such case a writ will be refused on the ground of laches. McDowell v. Dalton, 33 Misc. 368 N. Y. Supp. 419.

Neglect for two years to apply for a mandamus to reinstate a removed officer is such laches, when unexplained and unexcused, as to preclude the granting of the writ. People ex rel. Shea v. Bryant, 28 App. D. 480, 51 N. Y. Supp. 119.

The unexcused and unexplained delay of a year and five months in making application for a writ of mandamus to restore to active duty a fireman unlawfully retired to on a pension constitutes such laches as requires a denial of the writ. People ex rel. Miller v. Sturgis, 82 App. Div. 580, 81 N. Y. Supp. 816.

A delay of sixteen months without adequate excuse or explanation, by one who has been removed from a position in the city service of New York, is such laches as requires that his application for a mandamus to reinstate him be denied. People ex rel. Connolly v. Board of Education, 1 App. Div. 1, 99 N. Y. Supp. 737, affirming in 187 N. Y. 535, 80 N. E. 1116.

An unexplained and unexcused delay of eleven months, by an employee of the public against any of them, and cause all their violations or neglect of duty to be promptly punished or reported to the proper authority for correction;" and that section is expressly continued in force, and it is said that this section confers the power of removal upon the mayor. That it did not give him such power prior to the adoption of the new Code is expressly decided in State v. Heinmiller, 38 Ohio St. 101, and State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Bryson, 44 Ohio St. 469, 8 N. E. 470; and the incorporation of it into, or the express continuance of it in force by, the new Municipal Code, does not add to its scope; but, on the contrary, the legal presumption is that it was intended to be limited to the interpretation that had been given it. The evident purpose of the legislature respecting the police and fire departments, as indicated by the provisions relating to them in the new Municipal Code, was to adopt a civil-service or merit system. The chief of police is made the executive head of the department under the direction of the mayor. He is given the exclusive right to suspend any of the deputies, officers, or employees under his management or control, and, in case of suspension, he is required to certify such fact, together with the cause of such suspension, to the mayor, who then finally determines the matter, excepting that an appeal may be taken to the board of public safety in case the judgment of the mayor is one of removal. The mayor is given the exclusive right to suspend the chief of the police department, and, in the event he sus-service, to apply for a writ of mandamus to reinstate him after removal, is such laches as to require a refusal of the writ. People ex rel. Rehm v. Willcox, 60 Misc. 329, 112 N. Y. Supp. 341.

Where there has been a delay of ten months in applying for a writ to reinstate an officer alleged to have been unlawfully removed, he is chargeable with laches, and is bound to explain and excuse the delay before the writ will be granted. People ex rel. Vanderhoof v. Palmer, 3 App. Div. 389, 38 N. Y. Supp. 651, affirming 15 Misc. 434, 36 N. Y. Supp. 833; People ex rel. Mehegan v. Scannell, 28 Misc. 401, 59 N. Y. Supp. 950; People ex rel. Dellett v. Board of Health, 56 Misc. 26, 106 N. Y. Supp. 923.

A delay of nine months without adequate explanation or excuse is such laches on the part of a removed officer in applying for a writ of mandamus to restore him to his office as requires that the writ be denied. People ex rel. O'Connor v. Brady, 49 App. Div. 238, 63 N. Y. Supp. 145.

Unreasonable and inexcusable delay for eight months in applying for a mandamus is such laches as justifies a refusal of the writ to reinstate an officer unlawfully removed from his office. People ex rel. Miller v. General Sessions Justices, 78 Hun, 334, 29 N. Y. Supp. 157.

Laches may not be imputed from a delay of six months, to an officer applying for reinstatement in an office from which he has been removed by colorable and pretended abolition of the office, when explained by the statement that, until he discovered to the contrary immediately before applying for the writ, he believed, and had no reason to doubt, that the office had been abolished in good faith. Re McDonald, 34 App. Div. 512, 54 N. Y. Supp. 525.

While there is no statutory limit within which an application for a writ of mandamus to restore an illegally removed officer to his position must be made, the analogous limitation of four months which applies to a writ of certiorari makes a delay for that length of time such laches as, if unexplained and unexcused, will justify a refusal of the writ. People ex rel. McDonald v. Lantry, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

48 App. Div. 131, 62 N. Y. Supp. 630; People ex rel. Finn v. Greene, 87 App. Div. 346, 84 N. Y. Supp. 565.

Unexplained and unexcused delay for four months in applying for a writ of mandamus to restore a removed officer to his position warrants a denial of the writ of mandamus when it appears that another person has been appointed in the place of the relator. People ex rel. Young v. Collis, 6 App. Div. 467, 39 N. Y. Supp. 698.

The mere lapse of time since the right accrued is important, but not absolutely decisive, upon the question of laches in applying for a writ of mandamus. Hill v. Boston, 193 Mass. 569, 79 N. E. 825.

When the right of a removed officer to reinstatement by mandamus is dependent upon a statute the application and construction of which are in dispute and in litigation in the courts, laches cannot be imputed to such removed officer on account of his delay in applying for a mandamus pending adjudication of the disputed question. People ex rel. McDonald v. Lantry, supra.

The apparent laches of a person applying for a mandamus to reinstate him in an office from which he has been removed, due to delay in applying for it, is excused when the legality of his removal depends upon the application of a statute which has been in dispute in the courts, with conflicting decisions, and the application is made immediately following the final decision by the court of last resort. People ex rel. Tierney v. Scannell, 27 Misc. 662, 59 N. Y. Supp. 679.

A public employee wrongfully removed from office, who seasonably applies for a writ of mandamus to secure reinstatement, and withdraws the application because of conflicting judicial decisions respecting the proper remedy, is not chargeable with laches upon renewing his application promptly after final decision by the court of last resort settling the conflict. People ex rel. Shuter v. Butler, 54 Misc. 18, 103 N. Y. Supp. 583.

The pursuit and diligent prosecution of proper legal remedies, although inadequate, by an unlawfully removed officer, will excuse his delay in applying for a writ of mandapende the chief, it is his duty to certify such fact, together with the cause of suspension, to the board of public safety, and it is given final jurisdiction. And it is made the duty of the mayor to prefer charges with council against any director of public safety for incompetency, neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, habitual drunkenness, or gross immorality, and it is made the duty of council to inquire into the charges, in the manner provided for the removal of other officers of the municipality. Evidently, it was thought that it would be conducive to the discipline or efficiency of the department, respecting the members of the police force, if the exclusive power of suspension should be vested in the chief of police, and, if the mayor should not have original jurisdiction to remove members of the force, but only in the event of charge being certified to him by the chief. If the chief fails in his duty the exclusive power of suspending him is vested in the mayor and he may suspend him and certify the fact to the board; so that the board of public safety does not deal directly with the members of the force or with the chief of the police, but exercises its control through the mayor, and the mayor does not deal directly or immediately with the members of the force, but with the chief of police and the chief is given immediate control of the men. This method seems to have been evolved from experience. But the wisdom of it, or effectiveness of it, is not a matter for our consideration. We have only to determine what the legislature, in its wisdom has prescribed.

mus to restore him to office. Hill v. Boston, supra.

An officer who has been removed from his office summarily without charges or hearing, when the statute requires both, is not guilty of laches when, twice within four months of his removal, he serves upon the removing officer a demand for a hearing, and gives notice of his right and privilege; and therefore will not be refused a mandamus notwithstanding, prior to his removal, he had been suspended from office without pay for nearly two years. People ex rel. O'Connor v. Brady, supra.

One who was removed from his position in the municipal civil service in violation of his rights, and who neglected to make application for a mandamus to restore him, for several months and until after the death of the officer who made the removal and the appointment of his successor, although he may satisfactorily explain and excuse his delay so as not to be imputed with laches, is not entitled to his writ without showing that he gave notice to the new officer of his removal, asserted his rights, and demanded his reinstatement. People ex rel. Taylor v. Welde, 61 App. Div. 580, 70 N. Y. Supp. 869.

It does not excuse a delay of several years by an officer unlawfully removed from his office, in applying for a mandamus to reinstate him, that the intervening time has been employed by him in seeking other remedies to recover compensation. People ex rel. Steinson v. Board of Education, 158 N. Y. 125, 52 N. E. 722, affirming 20 App. Div. 452, 46 N. Y. Supp. 782.

That the plaintiff applying for a writ of mandamus to reinstate him in the office from which he had been removed was without means to employ counsel, and had been advised by his unprofessional acquaintances that he was without a legal remedy, is no legal excuse for a delay of ten months in applying for the writ. People ex rel. Dellett v. Board of Health, supra.

Inasmuch as an application for a writ of mandamus to reinstate in office a person wrongfully removed will be refused unless brought within the period of four months an amendment to the writ curing defect therein will not be allowed after a lapse of eighteen months from the removal. People ex rel. Collins v. Ahearn, 120 App. Div. 104 N. Y. Supp. 860.

VII. The power of motion.

a. In cases of unrestrained discretion

A writ of mandamus is never granted to compel the discharge of a duty involving the exercise of judgment or discretion. People ex rel. Hoyt v. Ballston Spa, 19 Misc. 61, 44 N. Y. Supp. 471.

It is a well-recognized principle of law that the writ of mandamus will not lie to revise the judgment of an inferior court or to compel the action of a public officer to whom the discretion is given by law to decide the question involved. Johnson v. Galveston, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 469, 33 S. 150.

The general rule is, where a duty to be performed is judicial, or involves the exercise of a discretion of a tribunal or officer that the courts will not undertake by mandamus to control or review the action of such tribunal or officer. Riggins v. Richardson (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 84.

(A writ of error was obtained in this case, before it could be argued in the supreme court, the term of office expired, and that reason it was dismissed, in 97 Tex. 530 S. W. 524.)

The rule undoubtedly is, said the court in Morley v. Power, 5 Lea, 691, that in matters requiring the exercise of final judgment, or resting in the sound discretion of the person to whom a duty is confided by law, mandamus will not lie either to control the exercise of that discretion, or to terminate upon the decision which shall finally be given.

A mandamus will not lie to restore to office one who has been removed therefrom by superiors vested with an absolute discretion to dismiss him. Hermitage's Case Comb. 210.

The fact that, subsequently to the commencement of this action, the city council repealed the ordinance creating the office that was filled by the relator, and that it enacted another ordinance providing for a police force, and that an appointment has been made to the office created by the new ordinance, is not important, for the reason that the office that was filled by the relator was not abolished. The new ordinance by which the old ordinance was repealed did not make any change respecting the office held by the relator. And in such case the new ordinance should be construed merely as continuing in force the provisions of the repealed ordinance that were incorporated into the new ordinance. Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrig. Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 327, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7;

Wright v. Oakley, 5 Met. 400. The restoration of relator to his office and the ousting of the person who was appointed to succeed him does not present a case of determining title to an office, because, his removal having been absolutely void, the pretended appointment is a mere nullity. State ex rel. Mason v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190.

The mayor being without jurisdiction, there is no controversy as to the relevant and controlling facts, and, proceeding to render the judgment that the circuit court should have rendered, it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandamus as prayed for issue against the respondent as mayor. Peremptory writ allowed.

Price, Spear, and Davis, JJ., concur.

Mandamus will not lie against a public board to require it to reinstate a discharged employee removable at pleasure. Portman v. State Fish Comrs. 50 Mich. 258, 12 N. W. 106.

One who occupies a place of public employment in contradistinction to a public office, and holds it at the will and discretion of the executive of the state or other public functionary, is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him thereto in case of his summary removal. State ex rel. Gruber v. Champlin, 2 Bail. L. 220.

When a public board has a right and the power to remove at will and discretion its employees, mandamus will not lie to reinstate in their former employments persons removed by such board, notwithstanding the removal was without charges, notice, or hearing. Trainor v. Board of Auditors, 89 Mich. 162, 15 L.R.A. 195, 50 N. W. 809.

When a municipality has the power, by its charter, to appoint and remove at will municipal officers, mandamus will not lie to restore a municipal officer to his office, notwithstanding his removal without any cause. R. v. Cambridge, 2 Shower, 69.

When the tenure of appointments to office under a charter of incorporation is during the pleasure of the municipal authorities, mandamus will not lie to restore an officer to his office who has been removed without any cause being assigned. Ex parte Langen, 8 N. B. 135.

Power of the court to inquire into the legality of the removal of an officer who applies for a writ of mandamus to reinstate him does not exist when the statute authorizing his removal makes the body which removed him the sole judge of the sufficiency of the cause of removal. Lunt v. Davison, 104 Mass. 498.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office an officer who has been removed therefrom by his superiors, where such superiors are invested by statute with a discretionary power to remove their subordinates whenever, in the exercise of their judgment, there is cause for such removal. State ex rel. O'Neill v. Register, 59 Md. 283. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Although in the foregoing case the court broadly asserted the stated proposition, afterwards, in Miles v. Stevenson, 80 Md. 358, 30 Atl. 646, it qualified the statement as follows: "We agree that the writ of mandamus does not lie to control the discretion of any tribunal, however limited its jurisdiction may be. Hence, when the act complained of rests in the exercise of a discretion, the remedy fails. But this discretion is not unlimited, for, if it be exercised with manifest injustice, the court will command its due exercise. . . . It must be a sound discretion and according to law."

When a statute makes a governmental body the final judge of the qualification of its members and their election to membership, mandamus will not lie to compel it to restore one whom it has excluded without hearing on the merits. People ex rel. Cooley v. Fitzgerald, 41 Mich. 2, 2 N. W. 179.

The common council of the city of Philadelphia being vested with power to judge of the qualifications of its own members, its action in unseating one of its members when taken at any regular meeting after notice and hearing, will not be interfered with by the courts by a writ of mandamus to reinstate the unseated member. Com. ex rel. Duffield v. Loughlin, 20 Phila. Leg. Int. 100.

Mandamus will not lie to restore a recorder to his office where he is removable at the pleasure of the corporation, and another person has been appointed in his stead. R. v. Canterbury, 11 Mod. 403.

A mandamus will not be granted to restore a sergeant-at-mace to his office in a corporation which has the power to remove him at pleasure. R. v. Dartmouth, 3 Salk. 229.

Clerks of the district courts of the United States hold their offices at the will of the courts, and, if removed therefrom by the district judge, are not entitled to mandamus to obtain reinstatement. Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet. 230, 10 L. ed. 138.

A clerk to a justice in petty sessions, appointed by order of such sessions, has no legal hold upon his office; and the court will not interfere if he is dismissed summarily, and without cause assigned. Ex parte Sandys, 4 Barn. & Ad. 863.

Mandamus does not lie to restore the clerk and treasurer of the guardians of the poor of St. Nicholas, Rochester. R. v. St. Nicholas, 4 Maule & S. 324.

A mandamus will not lie to restore a town clerk removed without cause from his office, when he held it merely during the pleasure of the corporation. R. v. Stratford upon Avon, 1 Lev. 291; Stratford on Avon, 2 Keble, 641, s. c. sub nom. R. v. Deighton, 2 Keble, 656.

Mandamus does not lie to restore a clerk to his office in the office of the "custos brevium," because it was said in Whitechurch v. Pagot, Style, 208, that the master of the office is unanswerable for all his clerks and has power over them, and they are not officers, but mere servants, and therefore there is no remedy to be had in law against him, but that in conscience he ought to restore him; and therefore an order to show cause why the applicant should not be restored was granted. The case, however, was never decided because of a compromise by the parties.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office a policeman who has been removed therefrom by his superiors in the exercise of a discretion vested in them by law. Gleisman v. West New York, 74 N. J. L. 74, 64 Atl. 1084.

When the members of a board of police commissioners are empowered by statute to remove any policeman for cause, and are made the sole judges of what is sufficient cause for such removal, their action in removing a policeman cannot be controlled by the courts; and a writ of mandamus will not lie to restore a policeman to his office. State ex rel. Pinkerman v. Rusling, 64 Conn. 517, 30 Atl. 758.

A court of competent jurisdiction, upon an application for mandamus to restore to his office one who has been removed therefrom by a governmental body vested with the power to appoint and remove subordinate officers, is bound to inquire whether incompetency, wilful neglect of duty, or misdemeanor in office really existed in case of a removal before the expiration of a term of office, because it is only for some such cause that the power of removal can be exercised. Miles v. Stevenson, supra.

The decision in State ex rel. O'Neill v. Register, supra, was carefully distinguished in Miles v. Stevenson, supra, by the following language: "What we have said is not to be understood as applying to a class of cases where there is no limit fixed to the term of the office, and the appointee holds merely at the will of the appointing power; nor to another class, where the power of removal is vested by statute in the discretion of any person or body of persons; nor where it depends on the exercise of personal judgment as to whether the cause for removal be sufficiently good."

removals from office of certain officers, mandamus will not lie to restore such officers to their offices after having been removed by the proper authority. Lunt v. Davison, 104 Mass. 498.

The discretion of an officer, official body, or tribunal, which cannot be interfered with by mandamus to effect restoration to office of one removed therefrom by the action of such an officer, body, or tribunal, does not exist when the act done is ministerial upon a given state of facts, although the removing power must judge, according to its best discretion, whether the act of removal should be performed, and whether the facts exist that warrant removal; since, were it otherwise, it is obvious mandamus would never lie in any case. Morley v. Power, 5 Lea, 691; Terrell v. Greene, 88 Tex. 539, 31 S. W. 631.

The power given by a statute to a board of aldermen to remove a mayor when, in the judgment of its members, there is sufficient cause for his removal, does not confer upon such board unlimited discretion to remove a mayor, but one which can be exercised only when a recognized offense against the law has been committed; and therefore does not bar the remedy by mandamus to reinstate a mayor who has been arbitrarily removed. Milliken v. Weatherford, 54 Tex. 388, 38 Am. Rep. 629.

The uncontrolled discretion of inferior officers or bodies includes only their discretion upon the subject-matter which by law they may determine; but does not include their decision as to the extent of their own authority. State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254.

The case of State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, supra, was cited, and its opinion adopted, upon the point relating to the discretion of the removing power, in Terrell v. Greene, supra.

When the power to remove for due cause is given, the words "due cause" operate as a limitation on the power. State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, supra.

Although a corporation has the power to remove at will its town clerk, nevertheless, upon an application for a mandamus to restore a town clerk to his office, if the corporation returns a removal upon the ground of a misdemeanor, and does not rely upon its power to remove arbitrarily, a mandamus will issue if the return grounds of the removal are insufficient. R. v. Oxon, 2 Salk. 428.

A return, to be sufficient to require a denial of a mandamus to restore to his office a common councilman upon the ground that the corporation, by an ancient custom, might remove ad libitum, must set forth that the removal was positively an exercise of that power, and not leave it to be inferred from mere recital in the return. R. v. Coventry, 2 Salk. 430.

b. Under statutory restriction.

A municipal corporation cannot disfranchise a burgess unless it has authority so to do, either by the express words of the charter, or by prescription. Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 93b.

A return to a mandamus to restore an alderman to an office from which he has been removed by the common council is not good when it does not show a power to remove, vested in the common council. Such a power is incidental to the corporation, but cannot be exercised by a part of the corporation unless it is vested in such part by charter or prescription. R. v. Doncaster, Saver, 37.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office a city councilman who has been excluded therefrom by reason of illegal and void proceedings for his recall by the electors, under a special statute enacted in that behalf. Davenport v. Los Angeles, 140 Cal. 508, 80 Pac. 684, Beatty, Chief Justice, dissenting.

A writ of mandamus issues to a county commissioner's court to compel it to restore to his office a clerk whom it has removed without complying with the statute authorizing such a removal. Street v. Gallatin County, Breesee (Ill.) 25.

Mandamus will issue to restore to his office a clerk of the peace discharged by the session, under the statute 1 Wm. & Mary, chap. 21, without a charge having been made in writing and exhibited against him. R. v. Evans, 1 Shower, 282.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to restore to his office one illegally removed from a municipal office of trust and profit, who held it by virtue of a system established by law to maintain a proper civil service. Thompson v. Troup, 74 Conn. 121, 49 Atl. 907.

The writ of mandamus lies to restore to his office a subordinate officer removed by his superior unlawfully, whenever the statutory power of removal vested in such superior limits the exercise of the power to specified causes. Miles v. Stevenson, 80 Md. 358, 30 Atl. 646.

Inasmuch as the statute of the state of New York (Laws 1892, chap. 571) forbids the removal of veteran volunteer firemen from their positions in the public service held under appointment for indefinite times, except for cause after hearing, such persons, if removed arbitrarily, are entitled to reinstatement by mandamus. People ex rel. Drake v. Sutton, 88 Hun, 173, 34 N. Y. Supp. 487.

The statute of New York giving preference of appointment and employment to honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors upon all public works of the state, provided they possess the necessary capacity to discharge the duties of the position involved (Laws 1887, chap. 464), imposes upon public officers a duty and confers upon veterans a right which may be enforced by mandamus. Sullivan v. Gilroy, 55 Hun, 285, 8 N. Y. Supp. 401.

A statute having been adopted in the state of New York (Laws 1896, chap. 821) to the effect that a veteran improperly removed from a state or municipal position shall have a remedy by mandamus for righting the wrong, under this statute a veteran officer or employee of a municipal department, who has been wrongfully removed, is entitled to mandamus, not relegated to an action in the nature of quo warranto to restore him to his place. People ex rel. Tate v. Dalton, 158 N. Y. 204, 52 N. E. 1119, affirming 34 App. Div. 6, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1060.

An ordinary laborer employed in the department of public works is within the scope and protection of the statute giving preference in public employment to honorably discharged Union sailors and soldiers, and, if removed from his position in violation of such statute without cause, is entitled to a mandamus to restore him to his place. Sullivan v. Gilroy, supra.

A Civil War veteran employed by the city as a laborer, eligible under the civil-service rules for appointment and employment, and competent to perform his duties, wrongfully discharged and refused employment when there is work for his class to be done, may compel his reinstatement by writ of mandamus. Ransom v. Boston, 193 Mass. 537, 79 N. E. 823.

When a special statute forbids the removal from his office, except for good cause shown and after a hearing, a veteran of the Civil War, and commands that he be continued therein during good behavior, mandamus will issue to restore to his position an officer discharged in violation of such statute. State ex rel. Lewis v. Board of Public Works, 51 N. J. L. 240, 17 Atl. 112.

An honorably discharged soldier of the Civil War, who has been removed from his position in the fire department of the city of New York in violation of the statute giving veterans the preference, is entitled to a mandamus to reinstate him, notwithstanding the place has been filled by the appointment of another incumbent. People ex rel. Mesick v. Scannell, 63 App. Div. 243, 71 N. Y. Supp. 383.

A municipal employee who has been arbitrarily and summarily removed because of his political affiliations, and merely to make place for another person, in violation of a statute, is entitled to a writ of mandamus to restore him to his position. People ex rel. Boyd v. Hertle, 28 Misc. 37, 60 N. Y. Supp. 23.

Mandamus lies to reinstate in his office an employee in the civil service of a city of the first class, protected by a statute, where, in violation of such statute, he has been summarily and arbitrarily removed without proper reason and an opportunity to be heard. Truitt v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 70 Atl. 757.

A chief of police entitled by statute to retain his position during good behavior, subject to the power of the board of police commissioners to remove him at any time for good cause or when the good of the service should be subserved by his removal, cannot be removed arbitrarily without notice and charges or an opportunity to be heard in his defense; and, if so removed, is entitled to a mandamus to restore him to his office. Pratt v. Police & Fire Comrs. 15 Utah, 1, 49 Pac. 747.

A writ of mandamus lies to the head of the police department of a city, commanding him to restore to his office a clerk removed by him in violation of the provision of a statute regulating the civil service of cities, which controls the tenure of office of the clerk thus removed. Kipley v. Luthardt, 178 Ill. 525, 53 N. E. 74.

When a city charter and the rules adopted under it forbid the removal of a person employed in clerical work in any department of the city, except for sufficient cause duly shown, mandamus lies to restore a clerk to his position from which he has been removed without any assigned cause and without notice. Thompson v. Troup, 74 Conn. 121, 49 Atl. 907.

A writ of mandamus lies to reinstate in his office a medical officer of a city fire department who has been removed by the fire commissioner without charges and opportunity to be heard, in violation of a statute forbidding such removal. People ex rel. Banta v. Scannell, 50 App. Div. 625, 63 N. Y. Supp. 985.

One holding a clerical and subordinate position in the municipal service without original, independent, or governmental duties, and who has been removed therefrom without any hearing, in violation of a statute requiring it, is entitled to mandamus to reinstate him, in the absence of evidence that his position was excepted from the operation of the statute, and notwithstanding another person is filling his position under color of right, where such other person has been permitted to intervene and been made a party to the mandamus proceeding. People ex rel. Hoefle v. Cahill, 188 N. Y. 489, 81 N. E. 453, reversing 116 App. Div. 885, 102 N. Y. Supp. 325.

The writ of mandamus lies to restore to his office a municipal officer who has been removed therefrom without compliance with the statute requiring that in every case of removal true grounds thereof shall be forthwith entered upon the records of the department of the board, and the statement of the reasons filed in the department. People ex rel. Percival v. Cram, 50 App. Div. 380, 64 N. Y. Supp. 158, affirming 29 Misc. 359, 61 N. Y. Supp. 858.

But, when a statute gives a public officer power to remove his subordinates upon stating in writing the cause and giving them opportunity to be heard, without further limit upon the power of removal, mandamus will not lie to restore to his position a person removed by such officer if the requirements of the statute have been met. Porter v. Howland, 24 Misc. 434, 53 N. Y. Supp. 683.

When the head of a municipal department is vested by statute with power to dismiss for cause any officer of such department, mandamus will not lie to restore to his former position an officer who has been removed therefrom for a stated adequate cause. State ex rel. Hill v. Fire Comrs. 26 Ohio St. 24.

In R. v. Chester, 1 Wils. 206, a mandamus was refused to restore a prebendary or canon of the church of Chester to his place and office after he had been removed by the bishop, notwithstanding he was entitled by the foundation statute to be thrice admonished before being deprived of his place. The refusal went upon the ground that the bishop, being the visitor with plenary power in the matter, was not subject to the control of the court, and, the removal having been effected for good cause, mandamus to restore would be useless.

In R. v. Wrexham, 5 Ad. & El. 581, a mandamus was granted to restore a discharged clerk to his office who had been removed by the road commissioners in an action where the commissioners had the power by statute to remove their clerks, but could take official action only pursuant to previous notice, which had not been given.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office the collector of poor rates in a parish, who has been dismissed from his office by affirmative vote of but 16 members of a vestry consisting of 80 persons, at a meeting attended by only 35, of whom 11 voted in the negative and the rest of those present remained mute. R. v. Christchurch, 7 El. & Bl. 409, affirmed in exchequer chamber 7 El. & Bl. 420.

VIII. Removals for cause.

a. After trial upon charges.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office an officer who has been ousted therefrom by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in proceedings in the nature of quo warranto. Swartz v. Large, 47 Kan. 306, 27 Pac. 993.

When an officer having possession of an office, whose title thereto has been successfully contested and adjudged void by another claimant in regular legal proceedings instituted for the purpose, is ousted from his position by his successful rival, he cannot be restored thereto by writ of mandamus upon the ground that he had appealed from the judgment against him. Allen v. Robinson, 17 Minn. 113, Gil. 90.

A peremptory mandamus for the restoration of an officer will not be granted so long as a judgment for his removal, given by a jurisdiction able to remove him, remains in force. R. v. Baines, 2 Ld. Raym. 1265.

After a municipal council has tried a contested election of one of its members, and seated the contestant after ousting the incumbent, mandamus will not lie to restore the latter to office. Cripple Creek v. People, 19 Colo. App. 399, 75 Pac. 603.

Mandamus is not an appropriate remedy for reviewing the action of an officer in removing a subordinate. Its function is to command action, and it cannot be used for the correction of errors. People ex rel. Holden v. Woodbury, 88 App. Div. 593, 85 N. Y. Supp. 161, affirmed in 179 N. Y. 525, 71 N. E. 1137.

The judicial action of civil-service commissions in taking a public employee out of the competitive class in which he was protected from arbitrary discharge by his superior, and transferring the place to a non-competitive class, so as to make him subject to removal at the will of his chief, cannot be attacked upon mandamus to restore him to his place after he has been summarily removed without cause. People ex rel. O'Toole v. Hamilton, 98 App. Div. 59, 90 N. Y. Supp. 547.

If a removed officer has been accorded all his substantive rights in the proceedings for his removal, and the wrong alleged as cause for such removal has been substantiated, a mandamus to reinstate him will be refused. State ex rel. Tanner v. Police Board, 51 La. Ann. 941, 25 So. 935.

When an officer has been removed from his office after a hearing and an investigation by a body possessing authority to remove him, he has not a remedy by mandamus. Hartwig v. Manistee, 134 Mich. 615, 98 N. W. 1067.

Mandamus will not lie to reinstate in his office a member of the police force of a municipal corporation who has been dismissed therefrom upon conviction, after due trial by a proper tribunal, of a violation of the rules of the police department. State ex rel. Klaue v. Barrett, 22 Ohio C. C. 104; State ex rel. McKenzie v. Hyman, 22 Ohio C. C. 213.

If a pilot has been removed from his position by the commissioners of pilotage of his port for dereliction of duty or violation of rules affording an adequate cause for his removal, if established as a fact, he cannot be restored thereto by mandamus where the commissioners have in good faith and upon evidence found the fact against him. State ex rel. Stephens v. Pilotage Comrs. 23 S. C. 175; State ex rel. McDonald v. Courtenay, 23 S. C. 180.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to the office of Burgess of a municipal corporation one who has been removed for cause after having been heard in his defense, when the power of removal is vested in the corporation. R. v. Wilton, 5 Mod. 257.

The remedy of an officer who has been removed from his office after notice and a hearing upon the trial of charges found substantiated is certiorari to review the proceedings, and not mandamus. People ex rel. Grace v. Police Comrs. 43 How. Pr. 385, affirming 12 Abb. Pr. (N.S.) 181; People ex rel. Segree v. Hayes, 106 App. Div. 563, 94 N. Y. Supp. 754; People ex rel. Hanrahan v. McAdoo, 110 App. Div. 894, 96 N. Y. Supp. 1069; Elder v. Bingham, 118 App. Div. 25, 103 N. Y. Supp. 617.

Mandamus will not lie to restore an alderman to his office, where he has been removed for proper cause and after hearing, notwithstanding the municipal charter confers in express terms no power upon the corporation which has removed him, provided the exercise of such power is not forbidden, and ever was one of the ancient privileges exercised by the corporation before the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

granting of the charter. Haddock's Case, T. Raym. 435.

Suspension of a pilot by the Massachusetts pilot commissioners from his office as pilot, followed by his removal by the trustees of the Boston Marine Society after notice and opportunity to be heard, cannot be reviewed by the courts upon mandamus. Lunt v. Davison, 104 Mass. 498.

A mandamus to restore an officer of the city of New Orleans to his position after he had been removed upon charges followed by notice and hearing will not be awarded unless the proceedings show that the removal was a nullity, unsupported by any evidence whatever. State ex rel. Tanner v. Police Board, 51 La. Ann. 941, 25 So. 935.

But, when proceedings to remove a statutory officer take the form of a nominal trial upon charges, but are subversive of the rights of accused in that the charges are not specific, the witnesses in support of them are not examined on oath, and the accused is given no opportunity to be heard in his defense, mandamus will lie to restore the accused to his office in case of his removal. Geter v. Tobacco Inspection Comrs. 1 Bay, 354, 1 Am. Dec. 621; Singleton v. Charleston Tobacco Inspection Comrs. 2 Bay, 105.

A mandamus will not lie to restore a Burgess to his office who has been removed for misbehavior after he has had opportunity to be and has been heard, simply upon the ground that he was not summoned, because the end of the summons is only that he may be heard. R. v. Wilton, 2 Salk. 428, s. c. sub nom. R. v. Chalke, 1 Ld. Raym. 225.

b. Adequate causes.

1. Failure to qualify.

Mandamus will not lie to restore an alderman who has been removed from his office for failure to subscribe the statutory oath, although the return does not show that it had been tendered to him for subscription. R. v. Thacker, T. Jones, 121.

A mandamus will not lie to restore a Burgess who has been removed for not taking the oath and declaration required by the act of corporations. 13 Car. II.; R. v. Phillingham, 1 Keble, 777.

The statute of 1 Wm. & Mary, sess. 2, chap. 8, § 6, which enacted that, if any person then having any office should neglect to take the oath therein prescribed before the 1st of August then next ensuing, the said office should be void, works a forfeiture ex proprio vigore; and therefore an alderman of the city of London excluded from his office because he had neglected to take the statutory oaths within the time limited is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him to office. Smith's Case, 4 Mod. 53.

An alderman who has been excluded from his office when duly elected because he failed to qualify by taking the oath and subscribing the declaration cannot be restored by mandamus, for the election, ipso facto, becomes void. R. v. Sanchar, 2 Shower, 66.

2. Desertion.

Restoration to an office voluntarily abandoned cannot be had by mandamus. Eastman v. Householder, 54 Kan. 63, 37 Pac. 989.

An alderman who has been removed from his office for nonresidence, absenteeism, is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him, where an act of absence is definitely established. R. v. Shrewsbury, 2 Barnard, K. B. 394.

A burgess who has been removed from his office because he has ceased to be an inhabitant himself cannot be restored by mandamus. R. v. Truebody, 11 Mod. 75.

When a municipal charter requires that an alderman be both a citizen and an inhabitant of the municipality, a mandamus will not lie to restore to his office an alderman returned as having been removed therefrom because he had become a resident and an inhabitant elsewhere. Exeter v. Glide, 4 Mod. 33; R. v. Shrewsbury, 7 Mod. 201.

An alderman cannot be removed from his office upon the ground that he has become a nonresident of his borough simply because he has taken his family and gone elsewhere to reside temporarily for a few months. If removed for such reason, he is entitled to mandamus to restore him. R. v. Leicester, 4 Burr. 2087.

Mere residence in contiguous territory, of an alderman of a municipal corporation, is not a good cause for removing him from his office on the ground of desertion, or absenteeism, or nonresidence, when it appears that he actually attended to the duties of his office, and that other corporate officers frequently resided a few miles beyond the corporate limits. R. v. Doncaster, Sayer, 37.

A single absence of a public officer from his duty is not such a desertion as entitles a corporation to remove him. R. v. Wells, 4 Burr. 1999.

Where a school director's original title to his seat under a valid election is not contested, and the only question is as to the illegality of his ouster for alleged wilful absence from meetings of the board, his remedy to reseal him and prevent his further exclusion is mandamus. Com. ex rel. O'Brien v. Gibbons, 196 Pa. 97, 46 Atl. 313. And this is so even though a successor has been appointed and admitted to the seat by the other directors.

Mandamus lies to restore to the office of sword bearer a person illegally removed therefrom for absence and nonattendance. R. v. Bristol, 1 Shower, 288.

3. Resignation.

Mandamus will not lie to restore an officer who has been removed from his office pursuant to his own request. R. v. Tidderley, Sid. pt. 1, p. 14.

A police officer who has resigned under duress, and whose resignation has been accepted by the head office department, and who afterwards withdraws his resignation and demands reinstatement, which is refused, is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him to office. People ex rel. Goodwin v. MacLean, 62 Hun, 42, 16 N. Y. Supp. 401.

When, by statute, a police department of a city has been superseded and reorganized, and the policemen in actual service continue, as policemen under the new régime, and such statute forbids the removal of policemen except upon charges and hearing, mandamus lies to reinstate a member of the old police force in his place in the new department where he has been summarily removed without charges or hearing, provided his conduct prior to his exclusion did not legally amount to a voluntary resignation. People ex rel. Gorman v. Board of Police, 35 Barb. 527; People ex rel. Titus v. Board of Police, 35 Barb. 535; People ex rel. Dunn v. Board of Police, 35 Barb. 544; People ex rel. Hanrahan v. Board of Police, 35 Barb. 651.

A mandamus lies to restore to his office a burgess who has been removed therefrom for writing a libel, and who is alleged to have consented to be turned out, because the corporation has no power to try a case of libel, and a parol consent is too indefinite and uncertain. R. v. Lane, 11 Mod. 270, 2 Ld. Raym. 1304.

In R. v. Lane, supra, a mandamus was directed to the mayor, aldermen, and common council of Gloucester to restore Lane to the place of capital burgess, and it was returned that Lane had written a libelous letter to an aldermen, and, upon being charged therewith, he consented to be turned out; objections were made to this return as not good in that it should have been returned that Lane had resigned his office, and that his resignation had been accepted. Mr. Justice Powell held that a resignation might be made by parol, but that the return should have been more certain; and, according to this report, a peremptory mandamus was granted per curiam. The case is also reported somewhat differently in Fortescue, 275.

In the case of Verrior v. Sandwich, Sid. pt. 1, p. 305, the court, without, however, so deciding, was of the opinion that a return that the town clerk who sought restoration to his office by mandamus had been elected mayor was good, and that the acceptance of the office of mayor was in effect a resignation of that of town clerk.

4. Causes involving moral turpitude.

A return to a mandamus to restore one to the office of capital citizen of a municipality who was removed after hearing upon a charge of bribery is sufficient to prevent the issue of the writ, notwithstanding the charge is of an offense indictable at common law, upon which no conviction has been had, because it is also an offense against the duty of the office over which the corporation has jurisdiction. R. v. Carlisle, Fortescue, 200.

In R. v. Chalk, Comb. 396, Chief Justice Holt remarked, upon an application for a mandamus to restore a burgess to his office who had been removed upon the charge of falsifying the court records, that, if a man be guilty of perjury, forgery, etc., he is not to be removed before conviction; but the raising of the corporation book is not an offense at common law, but one against the duty of the place. Although he did not then deny the application, but adjourned the case for further consideration.

Whether a burgess who has committed an offense indictable at law and a breach of his official oath and duty can be disfranchised before conviction of the indictable offense, Lord Hardwicke, in R. v. Derby, Cas. t. Hardw. 153, did not deem it necessary to decide; but he was of the opinion that the burgess, in such a case, might be disfranchised for acts which amounted to a breach of his oath and duty, and therefore held that a return to a mandamus to restore a burgess removed under such circumstances was good.

In R. v. Taylor, 3 Salk. 231, a mandamus was granted to restore to his place an alderman of the city of Gloucester, who had been removed by the common council upon the ground that he was a common drunkard, because the court was of the opinion that the return was insufficient, not because the charge did not warrant removal, for the court thought it did, but because it did not appear that the common council, at the time of the removal, had been convened for official business. Afterwards, it is reported, the question was, whether the corporation might proceed de novo to remove the restored officer for drunkenness, and the court held that it might.

5. Unfitness, unfaithfulness, and incompetency.

If the applicant for a writ of mandamus to restore him to office appears to be under a disability to hold the office, the writ must be denied. R. v. Bristol, 1 Shower, 288.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office an officer who has been removed therefrom, when it clearly appears that he has become disqualified from holding such office. Bunting v. Willis, 27 Gratt. 144, 21 Am. Rep. 338.

When an applicant for a writ of mandamus to reinstate him in an office from which he has been summarily removed is unfit for the position, the writ of mandamus will not issue regardless of the question of the legality of his removal. McQueen v. Detroit, 116 Mich. 90, 74 N. W. 387.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to office a veteran soldier of the Union Army entitled to preference, when the return showed that he had been removed for negligence and incompetency in the discharge of his duty. People ex rel. Connor v. Brookfield, 2 App. Div. 299, 37 N. Y. Supp. 718.

A mandamus will not be granted to restore an officer to his office when illegally removed, when it appears upon his own showing that there was good ground for displacing him if the proceedings had been regular. R. v. London, 2 T. R. 177.

6. Original ineligibility.

As to whether the removal of an officer upon the ground that he was ineligible when he took office requires the denial of a mandamus to restore him, the courts are not agreed.

Mandamus will not lie to restore a Burgess of a corporation to his office when he has been excluded therefrom upon the ground that he was disqualified by statute when elected. R. v. Aldborough, 10 Mod. 100.

If it appears, upon the application for a writ of mandamus to restore to office one alleged to have been illegally removed, that the applicant was ineligible, the writ cannot be granted. People ex rel. Lane v. Lindblom, 215 Ill. 58, 74 N. E. 73.

To entitle a removed officer to a writ of mandamus to restore him to office, he is bound affirmatively to show that he was eligible and had a constitutional right to exercise the duties of the office. Spencer County Ct. Justices v. Harcourt, 4 Mon. 499; Jefferson County Ct. Justices v. Clark, 1 T. B. Mon. 82.

Although an officer may have been unlawfully removed from the office which he was de facto holding, mandamus will not issue to reinstate him if he had no constitutional or legal right to hold the office in the first place. Spencer County Ct. Justices v. Harcourt, supra.

It is no answer to an application to restore to his office a city alderman who has been removed by the city council, and has petitioned for a mandamus to reinstate him, that he was ineligible or disqualified from holding such office; since that is a question which the council has no power or jurisdiction to decide. Doran v. DeLong, 48 Mich. 552, 12 N. W. 848.

A municipal board of aldermen has not the power, by summary resolution, to deprive one of its members of his seat on the ground that he was ineligible when elected. Ellison v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 125.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office a state's attorney whose office has been summarily declared vacant by the board of county commissioners of his county on the ground that he was ineligible, when he had been in fact discharging the duties of the office for more than a year without question; since his right to hold the office in such case can properly be determined only by quo warranto in a court of competent jurisdiction. Howard v. Burns, 14 S. D. 383, 85 N. W. 920.

It is not a sufficient answer to an application for a mandamus to reinstate in his position an unlawfully removed public-school teacher that the question of the legality of his original appointment is in litigation in a pending suit in equity. Morley v. Power, 5 Lea, 691.

It is not a good return to a mandamus for restoring an officer to his office after he has been removed therefrom, to say that he was incapable of being elected in the first place. The proper way of trying that question is by an information in the nature of quo warranto. R. v. Doncaster, Sayer, 37.

It is no answer to an application by an illegally removed officer for a mandamus to restore him, that the person or body against whom the writ is to run had not the power to appoint him to such office in the first instance. State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254.

c. Abolition of the office.

Mandamus will not lie to reinstate a removed officer in his office where the office itself has in good faith been abolished, notwithstanding the writ would have been granted in case of the continued existence of the office. People ex rel. Corrigan v. Brooklyn, 149 N. Y. 215, 43 N. E. 554, reversing 91 Hun, 308, 36 N. Y. Supp. 172.

Mandamus will be refused to restore to his office a municipal officer who has been removed therefrom, when the return to the application for the writ avers that the position has been abolished, and nothing appears to impeach the good faith of the respondent in abolishing the office. People ex rel. Linnekin v. Ennis, 18 App. Div. 412, 46 N. Y. Supp. 444.

If an office is actually abolished in good faith, one who has occupied it previous to such abolition is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him thereto. Re Kelly, 42 App. Div. 283, 59 N. Y. Supp. 30.

The statute prohibiting the removal of persons from the public service unless for a cause shown and after a hearing has no application where the position occupied has in good faith and for sufficient economic reasons been abolished; and therefore mandamus will not lie to restore to his position an officer removed from a place that has been abolished in good faith. People ex rel. Sweeney v. York, 43 App. Div. 444, 60 N. Y. Supp. 208.

Mandamus will not issue to restore to his office an officer who has been ousted therefrom in consequence of the abolition in good faith, for reasons of economy, of such office. People ex rel. Croft v. Keating, 94 App. Div. 123, 63 N. Y. Supp. 71.

The abolition of an office, made in good faith, ipso facto lawfully removes the incumbent thereof from his office, and he is not entitled to a writ of mandamus to restore him thereto. People ex rel. Levenson v. Wells, 78 App. Div. 373, 79 N. Y. Supp. 728.

Mandamus will not lie to reinstate a public employee in his employment when the position he occupied has been abolished in good faith. Re Porter, 24 Misc. 434, 53 N. Y. Supp. 683.

When a position to which a removed officer seeks reinstatement by mandamus has been abolished in good faith in the public interest, mandamus will be refused to restore him. People ex rel. O'Donnell v. Bermel, 51 Misc. 75, 100 N. Y. Supp. 728.

When an office is abolished in good faith by the power which created it, an incumbent at the time of its abolition, ousted because thereof, is not entitled to a mandamus to reinstate him. Silvey v. Boyle, 20 Utah, 205, 57 Pac. 880.

A municipal employee discharged solely on the ground of economy in public service, in good faith, is not entitled to mandamus to restore him to his position. People ex rel. Patten v. Waring, 62 N. Y. Supp. 966.

In case an office or a position of employment has been abolished, and, in consequence, the incumbent thereof has been removed, mandamus will not lie to admit him to the new office created in its place, with different, if similar, duties attached to it. Re Donovan, 89 App. Div. 50, 85 N. Y. Supp. 406.

After the abolition of an office in the civil service has been made in good faith, the creation of a different position, requiring similar duties, left unfilled, does not entitle the person ousted from the original position to a writ of mandamus requiring his appointment to the new place, without preliminary proof that it is necessary to have the service of somebody in the new position. Re Morrison, 75 App. Div. 480, 78 N. Y. Supp. 385, affirmed in 173 N. Y. 646, 66 N. E. 1112.

Under a statute requiring the transfer upon the same compensation, of a veteran of the Civil War to another position in the department in which he has been employed when, for reasons of economy, his position has been abolished, a writ of mandamus will not lie to compel the reinstatement of a veteran, unless a vacancy exists elsewhere in such department. Re Breckenridge, 160 N. Y. 103, 54 N. E. 670.

While abolition, made in good faith, of an office, is sufficient to prevent the issue of a writ of mandamus to reinstate an officer removed because of such abolition, yet, the alleged abolition of the office is a mere pretense and a colorable method for the appointment of someone else, mandamus properly issued to restore the removed officer. People ex rel. Hart v. LaGrange, App. Div. 311, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1026.

If an office has been abolished in bad faith, and merely as a pretext to get rid of its incumbent and appoint another in his stead to the same duties under a different name, mandamus will lie to restore him. Re Jones, 80 App. Div. 167, 80 N. Y. Supp. 420.

The abolition in bad faith of a municipal office, resorted to as a mere pretense to effect an arbitrary removal of the incumbent and to confer his office upon another, is no answer to an application for restoration of the functions and emoluments of such office. Silvey v. Boyle, 20 Utah, 205, 57 Pac. 88.

If an officer is excluded from office in bad faith, and a mere pretended or colorable election of a successor is made, so that it can be said that the removal and appointment of a successor are void, mandamus will lie to restore the former officer. R. v. Oxford, Ad. & El. 349.

The rule requiring a veteran who has been unlawfully removed from the municipal civil service in violation of his privileges and rights, to bring to the notice the removing officer, and to demand reinstatement on the ground, that he is a veteran, before applying for a writ of mandamus to reinstate him, does not apply where the office was abolished in bad faith for the sole purpose of making a place for another. People ex rel. Bean v. Clausen, 50 App. Div. 324, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1064.

But it has been held in one case that notwithstanding it is made to appear upon the trial of an alternative writ of mandamus to restore an officer of the city fire department who has been removed without cause, that the removal was unlawful and accomplished by means of a pretended abolition of the office and the colorable appointment of two other persons to discharge the same duties under another name, and not made in the interest of public economy, but, on the contrary, at an increased public cost, a mandamus will not lie to reinstate a removed officer; his only remedy is quo warranto against his successor. People ex rel. Lazarus v. Sheehan, 128 App. Div. 143, 113 N. Y. Supp. 230.

A mandamus lies to restore freemen to their franchise of which they have been deprived, contrary to ancient custom, without just cause. The Protector, Style, 477.

A writ of mandamus issues to direct a municipal corporation to receive and restore to his functions an expelled officer who has been removed without sufficient cause. State ex rel. Denis v. Shakspeare, 43 La. Ann. 92, 8 So. 893.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office an officer holding for a fixed and definite term, who has been arbitrarily removed from his office without cause, when there is no statute justifying such removal. Miles v. Stevenson, 80 Md. 358, 30 Atl. 646; Field v. Malster, 88 Md. 691, 41 Atl. 1087.

When a member of a municipal board of aldermen has been summarily unseated without warrant of law by the action of the board, and no successor has been seated in his place, but the office remains vacant, mandamus is the proper remedy to reinstate him in his office. Doyle v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 133, 45 Am. Rep. 677.

Mandamus lies to restore a member of the common council who has been expelled from his office without a special cause. R. v. Liverpool, 2 Burr. 723.

Mandamus lies to restore a common councilman to his office when he has been removed therefrom without sufficient cause. Earle's Case, Carth. 173.

Mandamus lies to restore a recorder to his office when he has been removed for an insufficient cause. R. v. Wells, 4 Burr. 1999.

Mandamus lies to restore an alderman to his office from which he has been removed without adequate cause. R. v. Brecknock, 1 Keble. 33.

A return to a mandamus to restore a jurate, that the corporation had power to elect jurates for their lives if they thought it expedient, and that they had elected the applicant, and afterwards deemed it expedient to displace him, which they did, is insufficient. Anonymous, 1 Lev. 148; Crips v. Maidstone, 1 Keble. 812.

In Kid v. Watkinson, 11 Mod. 221, and R. v. Wall, 11 Mod. 261, a mandamus was granted to restore to his office a parish clerk who had been removed without cause by the priest, on the ground that he was elected by the parishioners, and not simply employed by the parson.

Upon application for a writ of mandamus to restore to his office an officer alleged to have been illegally removed, the court has the power, and it is its duty, to look into the whole case, including the testimony, to ascertain whether or not injustice has been done. State ex rel. Donnelly v. Teasdale, 21 Fla. 652.

When a statute organizing a municipal board of education continues schools theretofore in existence, and the teachers in such schools in service until removed in the manner provided by law, a teacher who is discharged by the incoming board because of an insufficient number of pupils in attendance at the school in which she teaches is entitled to a writ of mandamus to reinstate her. People ex rel. Stanley v. Van Siclen, 43 Hun, 537.

It is a rule of common law, in accordance with the plainest principles of justice, it was said in Morley v. Power, 5 Lea, 691, that, to warrant the removal of an official under a limited power, specific charges should be made; and, after notice, all witnesses in the matter should be sworn. This case was approved and followed on this point in Butcher v. Charles, 95 Tenn. 532, 32 S. W. 631.

A power given to remove a public officer for misconduct can be exercised only in cases of misconduct connected with the discharge of the duties of the office, and does not justify the removal from office for an offense against law or matters in no wise connected with official dealing. Johnson v. Galveston, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 469, 33 S. W. 150.

Mandamus lies to restore to his seat as a member of the board of supervisors a person duly elected thereto and having a clear legal right to the office at the time of his election, who has been unseated for the alleged reason that, by statute, a change has been made in the boundaries of the district represented by members of the board, which has had the effect to throw him out of residence in the district which he represents. State ex rel. Gill v. Milwaukee County, 21 Wis. 443.

A return of no record of election is insufficient to prevent the issuance of mandamus to restore a removed officer to his office. Basset v. Barnestable, Sid. pt. 1, p. 286.

A return to a mandamus to restore a burgess to his office, which merely states in conclusion that he was not duly elected, admitted, and sworn, is bad, and will not prevent the issue of the writ. R. v. Lyme Regis, 1 Dougl. K. B. 79.

In R. v. Liverpool, 2 Burr. 723, Lord Mansfield and his colleagues, upon an application for a mandamus to restore a member of the common council to his office who had been removed because he had become a bankrupt, held that the reason given was insufficient to disfranchise him, notwithstanding the common council had a trust and power over the revenues of the corporation.

The conduct of a public officer, wholly unconnected with his duties, however reprehensible it may be, if not amounting to a public offense, does not justify removal from office. R. v. Wells, 4 Burr. 1999; Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 93b.

In Clerk's Case, Cro. Jac. 506, mandamus issued to restore to his office a churchwarden and burgess who had been expelled for having maliciously and causelessly presented one of the burgesses for being absent from the perambulation, and, upon being rebuked by the mayor, had spoken contemptuously, which the court held to be no cause for expulsion.

Mandamus lies to restore a burgess to his office from which he has been removed for an alleged offense unconnected with the duties of his office, but triable at common law, where he has not been convicted. R. v. Gloucester, Holt, 450; same ruling was made in London and Estwick, Style, 32, 42.

In R. and Boulton, 3 Keble, 464, mandamus was granted to restore Sir William Boulton to the place of governor of Bridewell upon an insufficient return by the city of London that the mayor and colleagues had removed him for not accounting for £1,000. The counsel of Sir William objected to the sufficiency of the return, first, that the city had no power to turn out any governor, either by grant or prescription; second, that the receipt of divers sums of money making in the aggregate £1,000 was too general a charge.

In R. and Jay, 3 Keble, 714, it was quaintly said that Offly excepted to a mandamus for Aye for alderman, returned that the defendant said Bailiff Flower is a knave, and ought to be posted for a knave all over the country; that no words are sufficient to disfranchise, and prayed restitution. Twisden, J., said oath cannot be imposed by by-law; also it is not said wherein he was a knave, but as to another, that is returned to have resigned, there can be no restitution, and the case was adjourned; afterwards he was restored.

Mandamus lies to restore to his office of burgess one who has been disfranchised for no other cause than preventing a corporation from collecting tolls claimed to be due by prescriptive right. R. v. Vicars, 11 Mod. 214.

In R. v. Shaw, 12 Mod. 113, a mandamus was granted to restore to his office one of the burgesses of Wilton because the offense for which he had been removed was not well alleged in the return.

To warrant the removal from his office of a public officer for misconduct, the charge must relate to some misfeasance or malfeasance in the action of his office, except after conviction of a common-law offense. R. v. Baines, 2 Ld. Raym. 1265.

A chamberlain of a corporation cannot be removed from his office as capital burgess for misconduct in the office of chamberlain; and, if this is done, a mandamus lies to restore him. R. v. Doncaster, 2 Ld. Raym. 1564.

In Middleton's Case, 3 Dyer, 332b, a mandamus was granted to restore a citizen of London who had been disfranchised for refusing to abide the award of two of the aldermen in the court of common pleas.

A member of a board of county commissioners who has been unlawfully unseated upon a mistaken ground is entitled to mandamus to restore him to his seat. Gra v. Beadle County (S. D.) 110 N. W. 36.

In the case of R. v. Pomfret, 10 Mod. 10, mandamus was granted to restore to his office a burgess who had been expelled therefrom because of inconsistency and repugnancy in the return to the application for the writ in alleging, first, that he had been expelled as an absentee after due election and qualification; and, second, that he was not qualified when elected. Apparently either reason would have been sufficient, standing alone, to prevent the writ, but the two were deemed to nullify each other.

If the return had simply alleged a facto election and want of eligibility, it would have been sufficient to prevent the mandamus. R. v. Buckingham, 10 Mod. 17.

IX. Arbitrary removals without cause

A removal of a burgess from his freehold by a corporation without a hearing is bad. Bagg's Case, 11 Coke, 93b.

Mandamus lies to restore a recorder to his place when he has been removed therefrom upon charges which he has had opportunity to hear and defend. The Protector, Style, 447.

Mandamus lies to compel the restoration of a public officer to his office, where he has been summarily removed therefrom without authority of law, and has a clear legal right thereto. Geter v. Tobacco Inspection Comrs. 1 Bay, 354, 1 Am. Dec. 621; Sington v. Charleston Tobacco Inspection Comrs. 2 Bay, 106.

A writ of mandamus will issue to restore to his office a member of a city council who has been expelled by his fellow members unlawfully and without sufficient cause, notice, and hearing. State ex rel. McMal v. New Orleans, 107 La. 632, 32 So. 22.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to restore to his office the superintendent of a state insane asylum arbitrarily and wrongfully removed without cause, before the expiration of his term of office, by the state board of trustees. Eastman v. Householder, 54 Kan. 63, 37 Pac. 989.

Unless he is protected by some statutory forbidding his summary removal, mandamus will not lie to reinstate a municipal employee in a position from which he has been arbitrarily discharged. People ex rel. Mc ales v. Ahearn, 111 App. Div. 741, 98 N. Y. Supp. 492.

When, in violation of a statute, a duly appointed subordinate municipal officer has been wrongfully removed without hearing or charges, and his position has not been filled, he is entitled to a writ of mandamus to compel his reinstatement. People ex rel. Coveney v. Kearney, 44 App. Div. 440, 61 N. Y. Supp. 41, affirmed in 161 N. Y. 648, 57 N. E. 1121, on opinion below.

When, by the terms of a municipal charter, power is vested in a board of fire commissioners to appoint firemen, provided the annual expenses of the fire department shall not exceed a certain sum, a fireman who has been appointed to his office by such board, and subsequently arbitrarily removed by its successor in office, is entitled to a mandamus to restore him thereto, unless it affirmatively appears that the limit upon the expenses of the department was unlawfully exceeded at the time of his appointment. People ex rel. Gleason v. Scannell, 172 N. Y. 316, 65 N. E. 165, affirming 69 App. Div. 400, 75 N. Y. Supp. 122.

A person holding a subordinate position in a department of the New York city government, who has been discharged in violation of law without charges or a hearing, has a remedy for his reinstatement in the writ of mandamus. People ex rel. Segee v. Hayes, 106 App. Div. 563, 94 N. Y. Supp. 754.

The mere fact that a municipal employee was not appointed for a definite term, or that the statute under which he was appointed has not fixed a definite term, does not authorize his summary removal at the discretion of the head of his department without notice or charges. People ex rel. Hoefle v. Cahill, 188 N. Y. 489, 81 N. E. 453, reversing 116 App. Div. 885, 102 N. Y. Supp. 325.

X. Depositions without removal.

a. Suspensions.

It appears to be the view of the English judges, when an officer has been merely suspended from duty, but not removed from office, that mandamus does not lie to restore him to the active exercise and discharge of his official powers and duties. But the American courts hold otherwise.

When an officer is prevented from discharging his official duties, but not removed from his office, mandamus is not necessary or proper to restore him to office, for the reason he has never been displaced. R. v. Oxford, 6 Ad. & El. 349.

A mandamus will not lie to restore a common councilman to his privilege of precedence, he not having been removed from his office. R. v. Tyther, 2 Keble, 250.

In R. v. Guilford, 1 Lev. 162, an application for a mandamus to restore an approved man who had been suspended by the mayor and aldermen after hearing, it was debated among the members of the court whether a mandamus would lie to restore when there had been a mere suspension without a removal. Chief Justice Hyde and Justice Kelynge were of the opinion that a mandamus does not lie for the suspending, for the freehold still remains; Twysden, J., was of the contrary opinion, holding that the suspension was a temporary amotion, and may never be terminated; but, as Justice Wyndham was absent, no conclusion was reached. 1 Keble, 868.

The suspension or removal from office warrants the granting of a writ of mandamus to restore the suspended officer to his office. Ex parte Wiley, 54 Ala. 226.

Mandamus lies in any case to restore a suspended officer to his office where it would be the proper remedy to restore him if removed. And it is the proper remedy to restore him to office when he has been illegally suspended while in actual possession of it under an undisputed right. Metsker v. Neally, 41 Kan. 122, 13 Am. St. Rep. 269, 21 Pac. 206.

Mandamus lies to reinstate in his office an officer who has been suspended without authority of law. State ex rel. Tyrrell v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 536; Re Croker, 175 N. Y. 158, 67 N. E. 307.

The general rule is that a person having an uncontested title to a public office, or an undisputed right to exercise the function of the public office, if illegally ousted or suspended from the performance of his duties, may be restored to his rights or office by a writ of mandamus. Terrell v. Greene, 88 Tex. 539, 31 S. W. 631.

"It has not been seriously questioned," said the court in State ex rel. Tyrrell v. Jersey City, supra, in its opinion granting a writ of mandamus to restore a suspended alderman to the exercise of all his legal and official rights, "that a mandamus is the appropriate remedy in a case like this. The books are full of authorities in support of it."

Although mandamus will not be awarded to try a disputed title to an office, it is well settled, said the court in Ex parte Lusk, 82 Ala. 519, 2 So. 140, that it is an appropriate remedy to compel the restoration of a rightful incumbent who has been wrongfully deprived of the enjoyment of his office by removal or suspension.

The reason given in Ex parte Wiley, 54 Ala. 226, why a writ of mandamus will lie to restore to office an officer who has been suspended therefrom illegally, is because, while a suspension is temporary, he may, under the pretense of repeated suspensions, be excluded altogether from office.

The legislature has plenary power, by statute, to require the suspension from office of an officer under indictment for a penal offense; and mandamus will not lie to vacate such suspension on the ground of the unconstitutionality of such a statute with respect of a constitutional elective office. Ex parte Wiley and Ex parte Lusk, supra.

Mandamus will not be awarded to restore to his office a suspended officer on the ground that he has not been given notice and a hearing upon charges to which the statute entitles him, when, pending application for the writ, the suspension has been followed by a trial upon due notice, and a removal by the authority having jurisdiction of the case. State ex rel. Julian v. Metropolitan Police Comrs. (Ind.) 83 N. E. 83.

It was decided by the appellate division of the New York supreme court in the case of Re Croker, 78 App. Div. 184, 79 N. Y. Supp. 640, that the chief of a municipal fire department who had been granted a leave of absence from duty upon his own request for a stated period upon the ground that his health required that he take a rest for that length of time, and who had prematurely returned to duty and had been directed by the head of the fire department to continue his vacation, and had refused to do so, whereupon he had been suspended, was not entitled to a writ of mandamus to restore him to active duty.

From this decision the suspended officer appealed to the court of appeals, and, upon such appeal, that court was of the opinion that it was error to refuse the writ in such a case because the relator had been invested by statute with certain independent official rights and duties that were not subject to control by the head of the fire department. The court of appeals was of the opinion that, while the head of the department had discretionary power to direct the manner in which the relator should discharge his official duties, and also had discretionary power to suspend him for disobedience generally, he could not prevent the relator from exercising the powers and discharging the duties which had been conferred or laid upon him directly by statute. But, inasmuch as it appeared that the relator had afterwards been charged with dereliction of duty, had been heard in his defense, and had been removed from his office after a trial, there was no practical question to be decided, and he had no right capable of enforcement by mandamus in the then pending proceeding, and consequently the appeal had to be dismissed. 175 N. Y. 158, 67 N. E. 307.

b. Retirements on pension.

A policeman retired from duty by the commissioner of police, and put upon the pension roll upon certification by a surgeon of his permanent disability and unfitness for duty, is not entitled to mandamus to replace him upon the alleged ground that the certificate was untrue in fact. People ex rel. Price v. Bingham, 125 App. Div. 722, 110 N. Y. Supp. 136.

The proceeding under the statute (Laws 1894, chap. 708) by which a fireman of the city of Brooklyn is put upon the pension roll of fire insurance by order of the commissioner of the fire department is not a removal, and therefore does not require a public trial. People ex rel. Shea v. Bryant, 28 App. Div. 480, 51 N. Y. Supp. 119. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

c. Transfers

A municipal officer transferred to another department of the municipal service upon the consolidation of the municipality with other municipalities under one general government and in pursuance of the general plan adopted according to law cannot be said to have been unlawfully removed from office; and therefore is not entitled to a mandamus to reinstate him in his old position. People ex rel. Percival v. Cram, 32 App. Div. 414, 53 N. Y. Supp. 110, affirmed in opinion below in 158 N. Y. 666, 52 N. E. 1125.

d. Reductions in rank.

A policeman reduced in rank by his superior is not entitled to a mandamus to restore him thereto upon the ground that his degradation was an arbitrary and summary action without notice or hearing, in the absence of some statute covering his case, which protected him against reduction. People ex rel. Kisselberg v. Chicago, 104 Ill. App. 2d affirmed in 210 Ill. 479, 71 N. E. 400.

Mandamus lies to restore a policeman to the position and rank he formerly held when he has been summarily degraded in rank without charges or hearing. Re Steden, 174 N. Y. 87, 66 N. E. 655, reversing 78 App. Div. 644, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1149.

When, upon an application for a writ of mandamus to restore to his former rank an officer who has been reduced in grade, prima facie case is made out showing action to have been illegal and violative of the applicant's rights, it is error to deny the application in toto, and to refuse an alternative writ of mandamus to try the issue of fact in dispute. Shepard v. Oakley, 1 N. Y. 339, 74 N. E. 227, reversing 102 App. Div. 617.

Delay in applying for a writ of mandamus to compel the restoration of a municipal employee to the rank and grade in his department in which he has been reduced in violation of law is sufficiently excused when it appears that at the time of and since reduction the question of the legality of his degradation has been in dispute in courts, and conflicting decisions there made; and that the application has been made peremptory following the final settlement of the conflict by the decision of the court of last resort. People ex rel. Strahan Feitner, 49 App. Div. 101, 63 N. Y. Supp. 209, affirming 29 Misc. 702, 62 N. Y. Supp. 969.

XI. When term of office has expired

A writ of mandamus will not lie to restore an officer to office after expiration of the term of such office. Woodbury v. Cou Comrs. 40 Me. 304; State ex rel. Good v. Police Comrs. 80 Mo. App. 206, affirming 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215; Colvard v. Graham County, 95 N. C. 515; Durham Case, Sid. pt. 1, p. 33.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the instatement of a wrongfully discharged lic school-teacher after the expiration of the term for which he was appointed and to which his contract entitles him. Fuller v. Brown, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 30 S. W. 506.

A public officer appointed on probation for a probationary period of a limited term is not entitled to a mandamus to continue him in office after the expiration of the probationary period. People ex rel. Sweet v. Lyman, 30 App. Div. 135, 50 N. Y. Supp. 444.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his office, upon the ground that he has been removed from it in violation of the provision of the civil-service statute, a subordinate in a municipal department who was holding office, when removed, under a temporary assignment and on probation. Fish v. McGann, 205 Ill. 179, 68 N. E. 761, affirming 107 Ill. App. 538.

A municipal employee whose duties required him to inspect the construction of a particular bridge work is not entitled to a mandamus to reinstate him in the office upon his discharge by reason of the completion of the work. Re Kenny, 52 App. Div. 385, 65 N. Y. Supp. 204.

A veteran soldier employed by a municipality as a bridge tender, and discharged in consequence of the demolition of the bridge to the end that it may be replaced by a new structure, is not entitled to a mandamus either to continue him in his employment, or to transfer him to a new position, for the reason that the granting of such a writ would either compel the city to pay the relator wages while idle, or else to remove another person in order to make a vacancy for him to fill. People ex rel. Chappel v. Lindenthal, 173 N. Y. 524, 66 N. E. 407, reversing 79 App. Div. 43, 79 N. Y. Supp. 928.

Mandamus will not issue to keep in office a subordinate officer entitled to a preference as a veteran of the Civil War, after the term of office of his principal and himself has expired, and he has been removed by the new incumbent in favor of a person over whom he is entitled, by statute, to be preferred. State ex rel. Hawes v. Barrows, 71 Minn. 178, 73 N. W. 704.

A writ of mandamus will not issue to restore to his office a member of a city fire department appointed for a definite term by virtue of a municipal ordinance, and removed therefrom because of the repeal of such ordinance and the adoption of another reducing the term. Donaghy v. Macy, 167 Mass. 178, 45 N. E. 87.

XII. Necessity of public interest.

Mandamus lies to compel the restoration of a person to any office of a public nature. Burr v. Norton, 25 Conn. 103.

But mandamus is never awarded, nor can it be, for any office that has not some interest in public government. Hurst's Case, 1 Keble, 354.

The essential element of a public office as distinguished from a mere public employment is that the duties to be performed shall involve the exercise of some portion of a sovereign power. People ex rel. Corkhill v. McAdoo, 98 App. Div. 312, 90 N. Y. Supp. 689.

A mandamus will not lie to restore a person removed from an office of a private nature. R. v. London, 2 T. R. 182, note b.

Mandamus will not lie to restore private officers, or mere employees, to positions from which they have been discharged (Middleton's Case, Sid. pt. 1, p. 169); and this is so notwithstanding they are discharging quasi public duties.

Mandamus will not lie to restore to his employment a mere employee not an officer. State ex rel. McLaghlin v. Board of Public Works, 51 N. J. L. 240, 17 Atl. 112.

A mandamus will lie to restore an officer, such as a churchwarden, sexton, steward of the court, to his office, because the places have relation to public duties. R. v. Raines, 3 Salk. 233.

In R. v. London, 2 Barnard. K. B. 398, a mandamus was granted to restore a person to the office of clerk of the works of the city of London against the objection that the office was of a private nature for which mandamus would not lie. Lee, J., said since Lord Holt's time mandamus had been granted for sextons and clerks of private companies, and accordingly the rule was made absolute.

But, where the place is of mere service, mandamus will not lie, as for usher of a school. R. v. Raines, supra.

A teacher employed by a school board under a contract containing the usual provisions is not a public officer, but a mere employee, whose rights and obligations are contractual; and therefore mandamus will not lie to restore a school-teacher to his position after he has been dismissed therefrom, but his remedy is the ordinary action at law for a breach of his contract, and that remedy is plain and adequate. Board of Education v. State, 100 Wis. 455, 76 N. W. 351.

Mandamus lies to restore to office a public school-teacher who has been elected or appointed to the position by the board of education, and not merely employed under a contract of hire and service, when arbitrarily removed from the position without lawful cause. Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 1042, Fox, J., dissenting; Butcher v. Charles, 95 Tenn. 532, 32 S. W. 631.

In Parkinson's Case, Comb. 144, there is a note saying it was admitted by the court that a mandamus lies to restore a school-master or parish clerk.

No mandamus will be granted to restore to the office of marshal of the court-leet and court-baron, or to restore a school usher. Stamp's Case, Sid. pt. 1, p. 40.

Mandamus will not lie for the office of steward of the court-baron and court-leet because it is but a private office. Stamp's Case, 1 Keble, 5.

In Comb. 348, is a note to case of Cudmore v. Tripe, asserting that in Hilary term, following in one Stamp's Case, a mandamus was granted to restore one to the office of clerk of the company of masons of London.

When a policeman has been removed by the head of his department from his office without trial, his remedy for reinstatement is by mandamus. Re Elder, 118 App. Div. 25, 103 N. Y. Supp. 617, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 509, 81 N. E. 1163.

But a policeman who is unprotected by statute from summary discharge is a mere employee, and not a public officer; hence, he is not entitled to a mandamus to reinstate him in his position in case of his arbitrary discharge by his superior officer. Com. ex rel. Markley v. Stokley, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 334.

An inspector of water supply to shipping in the city of New York is not a "regular clerk," within the meaning of the greater New York charter (Laws 1897, chap. 378, § 1643), so as to render unlawful his removal without an opportunity to explain. People ex rel. Warschauer v. Dalton, 159 N. Y. 235, 53 N. E. 1113, affirming 34 App. Div. 302, 54 N. Y. Supp. 216.

In Williams and Cary, Comb. 264, the court with some hesitation granted a mandamus to restore one to the office of registrar of the bishop's court of Gloucester.

In Anonymous, 1 Barnard. K. B. 195, an application was made for a mandamus to be directed to the conservators of Bedford level to restore a receiver. The counsel said that the defendants were incorporated by statute and were required to appoint a collector and receiver who were only officers at will; but the foundation upon which he made the motion was that the receiver was not turned out by the body; and the court granted the application.

In the Anonymous case reported in 12 Mod. 666, an application for a mandamus to swear in a steward of a copyhold court was made to Chief Justice Holt, who replied, the true reason of mandamus was, when aldermen, capital burgesses, or such other officers concerning the administration of justice were kept out, to swear them into, or at least restore them into, their places; and we ought not to grant it to swear a register for a bishop, though it be an office of a public nature; and he said he would not care to do it for the steward of a leet, though heretofore it were used to swear a physician of the college; and it is rare to grant it where one has any other remedy; and here it is a private officer to do service for a lord.

In Anonymous, 1 Barnard. K. B. 123, Sergeant Darnell moved for mandamus to be directed to the mayor and aldermen of the city of London to restore one Edmund Turner to the office of woodwarden, because it is an office in which he had a freehold; but the court said that that reason would not do unless the office was of a public nature, and then an affidavit was read which affirmed it to be a public office, but the court said that would not do either, for it is necessary that the affidavit must set forth some particular marks to show that it is such an office; and Judge Reynolds noted the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) difference between such offices which are parts of the corporation and concern the public government of the body, and those that are only beneficial offices belonging to the corporation; accordingly, counsel was directed to renew his application upon additional papers. Upon a later date (Id. 135), it was shown to the court by affidavit that the office was of a public nature, inasmuch as the business of it was to take care that the wood and coal for the use of the city of London were kept according to the proper assize, and that its incumbent was admitted to his office by the mayor and aldermen. The counsel cited precedents in which mandamus had been granted in like cases to restore a man to the office of master weigher of the King's beam, and the case of Cudmore v. Tripe, Comb. 347, to the office of surveyor of the New river; and the court again took the application under consideration.

Although a mandamus does not lie for a deputy, it does lie when a deputy has been removed, for him who deputed him, to have him either admitted or restored, for otherwise he may be deprived of his power to make a deputy. R. v. Marches, 1 Lev. 306.

XIII. Questions of practice.

a. Parties.

Several municipal officers discharging like official duties, who have been removed from their offices by a single order after a single trial of them jointly, may join as relator in one application for the writ of mandamus to restore them to their offices. State ex rel. Denis v. Shakspeare, 43 La. Ann. 92, 8 So. 893.

A mandamus obtained to restore nine persons to the places and offices of common councilmen was quashed in Anonymous, Salk. 436, because, according to Chief Justice Holt, Mr. Justice Eyre being of the same opinion, there ought not to be nine persons in one writ; the motion of one is not the motion of another; their interests are several, and they may have been removed for several different causes, one for one cause and another for another.

When a veteran has been removed from his position in the municipal civil service in violation of a statute, and another person has been appointed in his stead, such other person is a necessary party to mandamus proceedings for reinstatement. People ex rel. Mesick v. Scannell, 63 App. Div. 243, 7 N. Y. Supp. 383.

A mandamus to restore a person to his office as Burgess of the corporation, addressed to the mayor, aldermen, and capital burgesses of the corporation, reciting that the relator had been removed by A. B. et al. and commanding the mayor, aldermen, et al. to, in turn, command A. B. et al. to restore the relator, was, in R. v. Derby, 2 Salk. 436, quashed, for, said the court, it is absurd that the writ should be directed to one person to command another,

b. Additional relief.

One who has been illegally removed from his office cannot, upon applying for a writ of mandamus to restore him, have the further and additional relief of a writ to compel the payment to him of the salary or emoluments of the office, since his right to the latter does not accrue until, and altogether depends upon, his restoration. Chicago v. People, 210 Ill. 84, 71 N. E. 816.

c. Conditional allowance of writ.

A court has no power to annex as a condition to the granting of an alternative writ of mandamus to determine the right of a removed officer to reinstatement in his office that he waive all claims to salary since his removal. People ex rel. Collins v. Ahern, 115 App. Div. 171, 100 N. Y. Supp. 716.

d. Abatement.

While the writ of mandamus cannot issue against a sovereign state government, and therefore, when issued against a representative officer of the sovereign state, it necessarily abates upon his death, resignation, or the expiration of his term of office; the rule does not apply to a municipal corporation and the officers thereof, for the reason that municipal corporations can sue and be sued, and against these the rights of individuals can be enforced. People ex rel. LaChicotte v. Best, 187 N. Y. 1, 116 Am. St. Rep. 586, 79 N. E. 890, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 58, reversing 112 App. Div. 912, 98 N. Y. Supp. 1112, distinguishing People ex rel. Broderick v. Morton, 156 N. Y. 136, 41 L.R.A. 231, 66 Am. St. Rep. 547, 50 N. E. 791.

The right of an officer to be restored by mandamus to an office from which he has been unlawfully removed is not abated by the resignation, removal, or expiration of the term of the superior officer who removed him; but it may be enforced against the successor or successors of such a superior officer. Ibid.

Proceedings by mandamus against a board of fire commissioners composed of several members whose terms of office expire at different times, to require the reinstatement of a subordinate wrongfully removed, do not abate by the expiration of the term of office of one of the members of such board. People ex rel. Lazarus v. Coleman, 90 App. Div. 88, 91 N. Y. Supp. 432.

e. Discontinuance.

The applicant for a writ of mandamus to compel his reinstatement to service as a policeman may discontinue his proceeding as of right. People ex rel. Morgan v. Bingham, 115 App. Div. 474, 101 N. Y. Supp. 410.

XIV. Conclusion.

An applicant for a mandamus to restore him to his office after he has been wrongfully ousted is bound to establish certain fundamental conditions, upon the existence of which the granting of the writ ever depends. He must have a clear legal right to reoccupy the office. Both the law and the facts showing the illegality of his removal and right to reinstatement must be beyond controversy. He must be without any other appropriate and adequate remedy. He must not have slept upon his rights. He must apply for the writ promptly, and diligently prosecute. The continued existence of the office from which he was removed, and of the term of office for which he was elected or appointed, is a sine qua non; if the office has been abolished in good faith, or if his term has expired, the applicant will be refused the writ. If the office is filled by another under a color of right,—filled, that is, by an incumbent whose title to it is not obviously bad upon bare inspection,—not mandamus, but quo warranto, is the ousted one's proper remedy.

If an officer or public servant holds his place at the will of his superior, and no statute protects him from dismissal, mandamus will not lie to reinstate him if he is ousted, however arbitrarily and unjustly. But, notwithstanding an officer's tenure of office is protected by statute, he may be removed for cause, provided it is adequate. And, if an officer is removed from office for a stated adequate cause after he has been given notice and an opportunity to defend, then, although the conclusions that the cause existed and that he ought to be dismissed were erroneous, mandamus will not lie to restore him to his place; but he must seek a remedy by writ of certiorari.

The writ of mandamus does not run to the sovereign,—a principle that requires it to be refused when sought against the President of the United States, the head of an executive department, or a governor of a state.

As the writ is not one of right, it is not necessarily granted to an applicant who makes out a prima facie case. An officer may have been arbitrarily ousted in defiance of his right to remain at his post, and his right to restoration may be clear, and yet the court will refuse to aid him, by mandamus, to reinstatement if he is liable to be turned out again immediately after restoration by regular proceedings and for just cause.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

AMERICAN SURETY COMPANY

v.

PACIFIC SURETY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Conn. —, 70 Atl. 584.)

Pleading — fraud.

1. Where by statute fraud is a fact to be specially pleaded, a complaint is not sufficient to assert passive fraud by concealment, which sets out misrepresentations of fact, stating that the true fact was wilfully concealed, and concludes that by virtue of said fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments damage was done.

Bond — interest — penalty.

2. Interest may be added to the amount of recovery on a bond, although the total sum is thereby made to exceed the penalty of the bond.

Same — when accrues.

3. Interest on a bond to indemnify a surety on a contractor's bond accrues not from the time the surety's liability accrues on the contractor's default, but from the time the duty of the second obligor arises to indemnify the first one for loss suffered because of his undertaking, which, in case he contests liability for the alleged breach of the contractor's duty, is at the time judgment is rendered fixing such liability.

(August 3, 1908.)

Case Note. — Right, in an action on a bond, to recover interest when the total sum is thereby made to exceed the penalty.

In a note to Griffith v. Rundle, 55 L.R.A. 381, upon the general subject of penalty as the limit of liability on statutory bond, the earlier cases upon the question presented in the foregoing case are collected and discussed at page 384. As there shown, the earlier cases did not allow interest where the damages were thereby made to exceed the penalty, but many modern cases hold that interest should be allowed notwithstanding the fact that the amount might thereby exceed the penalty, upon the theory that interest is allowed only by way of damages for delay upon the part of the sureties in making payment after they should have done so, so that all the obligee recovers is the penalty, or rather what it would have been if paid at the proper time. This is now the generally accepted rule. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 701.

Thus, in Trumpler v. Cotton, 109 Cal. 250, 46 Pac. 1033, 1036, the court said that the general rule was that judgment could not be rendered against sureties for a greater sum than the penalty of the bond, and that they could not be held liable for interest beyond the penalty of the bond, except for such interest as accrued from their own default in unjustly withholding payment after having been notified of the default of their principal.

So in Spokane & I. Lumber Co. v. Loy, 21 Wash. 501, 58 Pac. 672, 60 Pac. 1119, the court said: "We think this objection to the judgment is not well taken. It is true that the surety on a bond cannot generally be held liable for any sum greater than the penalty specified therein; but where, as in this case, it appears that the surety is himself in default, we see no reason why he may not be held liable, in excess of the penalty, for interest upon the amount due, at the legal rate, as damages occasioned by his delay in the payment of his obligation." 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an indemnity bond. Reversed on condition.

Statement by Prentice, J.:

The plaintiff was surety upon a bond given by the National Steam Economizer Company, as principal, to the city of New Haven, to secure the faithful performance, by said principal, of its contract with said city for the installation of certain heating and ventilating apparatus in a city building. The facts relating to the giving of this bond, and those which led up to a suit by the city thereon, are fully stated in the case of New Haven v. National Steam Economizer Co. 79 Conn. 482, 65 Atl. 959. That action finally resulted in a judgment against

So in Ellyson v. Lord, 124 Iowa, 125, 99 N. W. 582, it was held that, while the debt for which the surety could be held liable was limited by the penalty named in the bond, yet interest might be collected on such debt from the time when it became the surety's duty to pay, even though the aggregate of the principal and interest would be more than the penal sum. This decision was cited with approval and followed by Getchel & M. Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Peterson, 124 Iowa, 599, 100 N. W. 550.

And in Holmes v. Standard Oil Co. 18 Ill. 70, 55 N. E. 647, it was held that the general rule that the liability of a surety on a penal bond cannot be extended beyond the amount specified as the penalty of the bond, was not infringed by the rendition of a judgment in an amount in excess of the penalty of the bond, to the extent of the interest on such penalty after the liability accrued.

So in McMullen v. Winfield Bldg. & I. Asso. 64 Kan. 298, 56 L.R.A. 924, 91 Am. St. Rep. 236, 67 Pac. 892, it was held that while the penalty of the bond fixes the limit of liability of the surety at the time the liability arises, yet, if the principal or surety fail to discharge that liability when it matures, interest may be allowed on the amount from the time the liability arises even if the amount of recovery shall exceed the penalty.

So there are numerous other cases which uphold this general rule that interest may be added to the amount of the damages recoverable under a bond, although the amount is thereby made to exceed the penalty. United States v. Walker, 128 Fed. 1015; Pennell v. Card, 96 Me. 392, 52 Atl. 801; Camden v. Ward, 67 N. J. L. 558, 52 Atl. 392; Pennsylvania Co. v. Swain, 189 P. 626, 42 Atl. 297; Grand Lodge A. O. U. V. v. Cleghorn, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 134, 48 S. W. 750.

In Thomas Laughlin Co. v. American Surety Co. 51 C. C. A. 247, 114 Fed. 627, was held that a surety's liability does not the plaintiff, rendered May 24, 1906, for the sum of $14,907.56 damages. The cause of action therein was found to have accrued July 27, 1903, and interest from that date was included in the judgment. This judgment the plaintiff subsequently paid, as also the costs of suit and expenses involved.

Shortly after the delivery of the bond to the city, the Economizer company gave to the plaintiff its written order upon the city for the first $5,000 to become due under said contract. Subsequently the plaintiff released this order, and in part consideration therefor the defendant, on September 11, 1902, executed and delivered to the plaintiff the indemnity bond in suit. This instrument was, in its pertinent parts, as follows: "American Surety Company of New York, hereinafter called the "surety," having, at the request of the National Steam Economizer Company, executed that certain bond, dated November 11, 1901, in the sum of $15,000, conditioned, in substance, for the faithful performance by the National Steam Economizer Company, of a contract with the city of New Haven for the construction of a heating and ventilating apparatus in the new high school building in York square in the city of New Haven, a copy of which bond is hereto annexed, and at or about the time of the execution thereof, there having been delivered to the said American Surety Company of New York certain collateral, and the said National Steam Economizer Company having requested the said American Surety Company of New York to release the said collateral: Now therefore, in consideration of the said American Surety Company of New York ordinarily extend beyond the penal sum of the bond even for interest thereon, unless he has in some way resisted or obstructed the claim against him.

The other view, however, still prevails in some jurisdictions.

Thus, in People's Sav. Bank v. Campau, 124 Mich. 106, 82 N. W. 803, the plaintiff claimed that at law, in an action upon a penal bond, interest may be recovered in the form of damages to an amount exceeding the penalty of the bond; that the plaintiff in an action upon a penal bond, with the condition for the payment of money only, is entitled to recover the full amount of the penalty as a debt, and the excess of interest beyond the penalty in the shape of damages for the detention of the debt. But the court held that the plaintiff's claims were in direct conflict with the mass of decisions, and in conflict with the principle which underlies them all, viz., that a penalty is not to be enlarged under any circumstances, and will not be enforced beyond the letter.

So in Randle v. Barnard, 99 Fed. 348, affirmed in 49 C. C. A. 177, 110 Fed. 906, the court, following the rule adopted in Missouri, refused to allow a recovery for a sum greater than the penalty, although it was urged by the plaintiff's counsel that he was entitled to interest on the penalty of the bond by way of damages for nonpayment of the money when the liability accrued, from the date of the breach.

So also in Board of Education v. National Surety Co. 183 Mo. 166, 82 S. W. 70, it was held that ever since the decision in Farrar v. Christy, 24 Mo. 453, decided in 1857, the rule had been adhered to in that state that there could be no recovery on a penal bond in excess of the penalty of the bond.

In Mutual Ben. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 80 Mo. App. 459, it was held that no more than the penalty could be recovered from the surety; but where the purpose of a bond was to secure the payment of the interest upon a note secured by a deed of trust, and it stated specifically that the object was to make provision as authorized 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by statute for the redemption of property sold under the deed of trust, the court said that they thought it was giving the bond a proper construction to add 6 per cent to the amount of the interest on the note after it was due. It will be noticed that this decision is not opposed to the Missouri decisions cited, but merely holds that the proper construction of the bond would include the interest added to the penalty.

So in Exchange Bank v. Springer, 13 Ont. App. Rep. 390, it was held that interest could not be added to the amount recoverable under a bond where it made the judgment more than the penalty.

And in Knipe v. Blair [1900] 1 Ir. Ch. 372, it was held that the general rule was that a bond creditor could not recover more than the penalty.

So in New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Seago, 128 N. C. 158, 38 S. E. 805, it was held that a recovery could not be had upon a bond in excess of the penalty, and the fact that the excess was made up of interest thereon made no difference.

In New York it is provided by statute that the damages to be recovered for a breach or successive breaches of the condition of a bond cannot in the aggregate exceed the penal sum except where the condition is for the payment of money, in which case the damages cannot exceed the penal sum with interest thereon from the time when the defendant made default in the performance of the condition.

Under this statute it was held in John Polhemus Printing Co. v. Hallenbeck, 46 App. Div. 563, 61 N. Y. Supp. 1056, that, in an action upon a bond for a breach of a condition to procure for the plaintiff a renewal of a lease of certain premises, the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the face of the bond.

And the above case was cited with approval and followed in Sachs v. American Surety Co. 72 App. Div. 60, 76 N. Y. Supp. 335, affirmed without opinion in 177 N. Y. 551, 69 N. E. 1130, which was an action upon a bond guaranteeing faithful performance of a contract.

releasing said collateral and continuing as surety upon the said bond, the said National Steam Economizer Company, as principal, and the Pacific Surety Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, as surety, do hereby undertake and agree: (1) That they will at all times indemnify and save harmless the said American Surety Company of New York from and against every claim, demand, liability, cost, charge, expense, suit, order, judgment, and adjudication whatsoever, and will place the said American Surety Company of New York in funds to meet every claim, demand, liability, cost, charge, expense, suit, order, judgment, or adjudication against it by reason of such suretyship and before it shall be required to pay the same. (2) That upon the making of any demand, or the giving of any notice, or the institution of any proceeding, preliminary to determining or fixing any liability which the said American Surety Company of New York may be called upon to discharge by reason of such suretyship, they will immediately notify the said American Surety Company of New York thereof in writing at its office No. 100 Broadway in the city of New York. . . . (5) That the liability of the Pacific Surety Company herein shall be limited to the sum of seventy-five hundred dollars ($7,500.00); it being understood that the American Surety Company of New York shall be entitled to full indemnification, as hereinbefore provided, from such Pacific Surety Company, up to said amount.

The defendant was duly notified by the plaintiff of the claim made upon it by the city, and counsel for the defendant were, in correspondence with plaintiff's counsel relative to the action upon the bond, aided in the preparation of its answer, were present during a portion of the trial, and were kept advised of the progress of the action. This conduct on the part of the defendant was accompanied with a statement that it was without prejudice to its claim of nonliability. Upon the rendition of the judgment the plaintiff made demand upon the defendant for reimbursement pursuant to the obligation of the bond. At the time of the commencement of the city's action against the plaintiff the Economizer Company was and has since remained insolvent. The defendant's answer contained two defenses in form. The first admitted the first paragraph of the complaint, which set up the execution and delivery of the bond, and pleaded want of knowledge or information as to the remaining allegations, which set up the breach. The second, which was double, contained a defense which played no part in the trial, and the defense of fraud inducing the contract outlined in the opinion. This embodied the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) defendant's real defense, in support of which its evidence was offered, and to which its evidence was confined.

Lewis v. Dwight, 10 Conn. 95; Branch Suretyship & Guaranty, § 93.

Prentice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant offered evidence to prove that the plaintiff, in order to induce the defendant to give the bond in suit, made to the defendant certain false and fraudulent representations material to the risk assumed by the terms of the bond, and relied upon by the defendant. The defense of fraud, though attempted to be established, was within the allegations of the special defense, and the evidence offered in support of it was received.

and submitted to the jury with instructions which are not complained of. What is complained of is the instruction of the court, in substance, that, while the defense of fraudulent concealment of truth resulting from false representations was before the jury under the pleadings, one of fraudulent concealment resulting from passive silence only was not, so that, if the defendant should fail to establish the making of false representations as charged, it could not assert the claim of defense that the plaintiff had been guilty of fraudulent conduct in remaining silent with respect to facts within its knowledge material to the risk, when it was its duty to disclose them to the defendant.

Fraud is a fact to be specially pleaded. Practice Book, 1908, p. 250, § 160. The fraud pleaded in this case is active fraud, and none other. The allegations setting up a fraud are confined to the following: First, there are those which aver that the plaintiff, in order to induce the defendant to furnish to the former the bond in suit and the indemnity thereby provided, made to the latter a variety of statements and representations about the risk, to wit, that the contract for the performance of which the plaintiff had become surety was an advantageous one, that there had been no default thereunder, that the contractor was all right in every particular, including solvency and business ability, that the plaintiff was perfectly satisfied with the risk incurred by it under its bond, that it was a safe risk, and that there were no reasons why an indemnity bond to be given by the defendant would not be a safe risk. It is then alleged that each of said representations was material, that the defendant believed and acted upon them and each of them in entering into its obligation, and that each was false and known to be false when made. Then follows a statement of the alleged fact in respect to each of said representations, by which it would appear that each was false and known to be false. In connection with one of these statements, and one only, it is said that the fact was that the contractor, whose contract was the subject-matter of the indemnity, was wholly insolvent at the time of the representation of his solvency, and known to the plaintiff to be so, and it is added: "Which said fact was wilfully concealed." Following these several statements is the conclusion that, "by virtue of said fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments, the defendant was greatly damaged, and would not have given said indemnity bond had the true state of facts been disclosed, and had the plaintiff not been guilty of making said fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments."

The defendant hangs its right to avail itself of the defense of fraud by silence where there is a duty to speak, upon the slender thread of the use of the words "concealed" and "concealment," as stated, and the reference to the absence of a disclosure of the true state of facts in the closing sentence. It is, however, too plain for argument that the pleader had in mind only active fraud. He was complaining of misrepresentations of fact; and the concealment of truth referred to was not a concealment by silence, but concealment resulting from the assertion of a contrary fact. The fault found with the plaintiff was not that it did not speak, and thus passively concealed truth, but that it uttered falsehood, and thus actively concealed it. It was thus that the true state of facts was claimed to have been undisclosed, and not, as the defendant now urges that he had the right to show, by the passive act of silence. That this is so is removed from the domain of doubt when it is borne in mind that the fact which alone is alleged to have been concealed relates to a matter concerning which a statement—a false statement—is alleged to have been made. The fact alleged to have been concealed was the Economizer company's insolvency. The prior averment is that it was expressly represented to be solvent. There was no room here for passive concealment by mere silence, and the pleader manifestly and necessarily had no thought of charging any fraud otherwise than by the representations already set up, and he charged none. He was charging fraud through the suppression of truth by falsehood, and not its secretion by silence. The presence in the answer of the isolated words upon which so much reliance is now placed was, it is quite apparent, simply an accident resulting from a choice of language. They were properly used to express an idea in consonance with the allegations of the defense, but not the idea now sought to be imported into the answer through them. The court was therefore right in not permitting the defendant, failing in his proof of false representations, to avail himself of a defense of fraud by the passive means of silence alone. This being the case, we have no occasion to consider the question, discussed at length in argument, as to the rule of duty in the matter of disclosing information possessed, which is applicable to a party in the position which the plaintiff occupied.

The cause of action upon which judgment was rendered against the plaintiff in favor of the city of New Haven accrued on July 27, 1903, and in that judgment, which was for the sum of $14,907.50, interest from that date on the amount of the default was included. In the present case, the jury was told that, if a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff it should be for the sum of $7,500, with interest thereon to date from July 27, 1903. The defendant justly complains of this instruction. Recovery in an action of debt on a bond is not limited to the amount of the penalty. Interest upon the debt after it is due may be allowed, although the total sum is thereby made to exceed the penalty. Lewis v. Dwight, 10 Conn. 95, 102; Carter v. Carter, 4 Day, 30, 4 Am. Dec. 177. The interest which may thus be recovered is, however, limited to interest from the time in breach; this being the date when the debt is said to accrue. Carter v. Carter, supra. The theory upon which this recovery of interest is permitted is that there has been an unlawful detention of money after the duty to pay it came into existence, and the interest is allowed as damages therefor. Selleck v. French, 1 Conn. 32, 33, 6 Am. Dec. 185; Jones v. Mallory, 22 Conn. 386, 392. As between the plaintiff and the city of New Haven, it was found that the debt from the former to the latter upon the bond then in suit became due July 27, 1903. It does not follow, as the court below seems to have assumed, that this defendant's bond to the plaintiff was broken at the same time. The test inquiry is: When did this defendant, by the terms of its obligation to the plaintiff, come under the duty of paying to the latter the principal sum which it has become holden to pay? Its agreement was to indemnify the plaintiff and save it harmless from and against every claim, demand, cost, charge, expense, suit, order, judgment, and adjudication whatsoever, and place the plaintiff in funds to meet every claim, demand, liability, cost, charge, expense, suit, order, judgment, or adjudication against it by reason of such suretyship and before it shall be required to pay the same. It can scarcely be said that the latter portion of this obligation required the defendant to place the plaintiff in funds until requested, and in this case no such request is claimed. No demand of any sort was made until the judgment in the suit by the city was rendered. Until that time the plaintiff was acting in harmony with this defendant in contesting its liability, and, as the corollary of its assertion of nonliability, was assuming a position in which there was no liability to it on the part of the defendant, and therefore no duty on the latter's part to pay it anything. Until the judgment was rendered which negated this contention and established the plaintiff's liability to the city, there was no such breach of duty on the part of the defendant in not paying the $7,500, or any part of it, that interest thereon became recoverable as damages for the unlawful detention of the money. The instruction for the inclusion in the verdict of interest upon $7,500, from July 27, 1903, to May 24, 1906, the date of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

judgment in the city's suit against the plaintiff, was therefore erroneous, and the verdict, upon which judgment was rendered, too large by the separable and ascertainable sum of $1,271.25.

There is error, and a new trial is granted, unless the plaintiff files a remittur as of the date of the judgment for $1,271.25.

All concur.

CENTRAL ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

(236 Ill. 444, 86 N. E. 104.)

Insurance — representation — warranty.

1. To constitute a warranty, a representation by an applicant for insurance must appear in the contract itself.

Same — part of contract.

2. A statement in an accident insurance policy that, in consideration of the warranties and agreements in the application, the applicant is insured, does not make the ap-

Case Note. — What reference in policy to application will make it part of policy.

The conclusion reached in the above case seems to find support in American Popular L. Ins. Co. v. Day, 39 N. J. L. 89, 23 Am. Rep. 198, in which it was held that a declaration in a policy that the insurance was made "in consideration of the representations" in the application for insurance would not have the effect of incorporating the application in the contract of insurance, so as to change the representations in the application to warranties.

On the other hand, in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Lampkin, 5 Colo. App. 177, 38 Pac. 335, it was held that a recital in a policy of insurance that it was issued "in consideration of the warranties in application" was sufficient to make the warranties in the application a part of the policy.

The same conclusion was reached in State ex rel. Young v. Temperance Benev. Asso. 42 Mo. App. 485, where a certificate of membership in a benefit society recited that the applicant was constituted a member "in consideration of the representations made in the application."

Such, too, was the result reached in Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Martin, 133 Ind. 376, 33 N. E. 105, where the policy stated that it was issued "in consideration of the statements of fact warranted to be true in the application."

So, in Webb v. Bankers' L. Ins. Co. 19 Colo. App. 456, 76 Pac. 738; Higbee v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 Barb. 462, affirmed in 53 N. Y. 603, and Parish v. Mutual Ben.

plication a part of the contract, so as to render a statement in it as to the age of the applicant a warranty.

Same — construction.

3. Courts will never construe a statement by an applicant for insurance as a warranty unless the language of the policy is so clear as to preclude any other construction.

Same — question of law.

4. Whether or not a statement of age by an applicant for accident insurance is material is not a question of law where it was not made in response to a direct inquiry by the insurer, or its materiality had not been settled by agreement of the parties.

(Cartwright, Ch. J., and Hand, J., dissent.)

ERROR to the Branch Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

L. Ins. Co. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 457, 49 S. W. 153, it was held that by a recital in a policy that the same was issued in consideration of the application, coupled with the further statement that the application was made a part of the policy, such application was incorporated in the contract of insurance.

And in McLendon v. Woodmen of the World, 106 Tenn. 695, 52 L.R.A. 444, 64 S. W. 36, where a certificate of membership in a benefit society recited that it was issued in consideration of representations and agreements made in the application, which also provided that it should form the basis of the contract, it was held that the application thereby became a part of the contract of insurance.

And in Fitzrandolph v. Mutual Relief Soc. 17 Can. S. C. 333, it was held that an application for insurance was incorporated in the bond of membership issued by the defendant society, where it recited that it insured the holder thereof in consideration of statements made in his application, and in a declaration annexed to the application the insured agreed that the bond should be void if the statements and answers to questions in the application were untrue.

And in the following cases, where the policy referred to the application for a more particular description of the property insured, and then added the words, "forming a part of this policy," it was held that the application formed a part of the contract of insurance: Burritt v. Saratoga County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Hill, 188, 40 Am. Dec. 445; Jennings v. Chenango County Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Denio, 75; Egan v. Mutual Ins. Co. 5 Denio, 326; Kennedy v. St. Lawrence County Mut. Ins. Co. 10 Barb. 285; Shoemaker v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 60 Barb. 84.

Mr. Jesse Wilcox, with Mr. Henry S. Wilcox, for plaintiff in error:

A representation will not be construed to be a warranty, so as to make the validity of the policy dependent upon its exact and literal truth, unless clear, explicit, and unequivocal stipulations require such an interpretation.

Supreme Council, C. B. L.* 32 App. Div. 245, 52 N. Y. Supp. 978;

225, a stipulation in a policy that it was made in the faith of the application, and that the statements in the matter were in all respects true, was held to make the truth of the material facts in the application as much a matter of contract obligation on the part of the assured, and conditions upon which the policy issued, and on the truth of which only it was to bind the company, as if the same had been embodied in the policy itself.

In Houghton v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 114, 41 Am. Dec. 489, an application was held to be adopted and embodied as part of the contract of insurance to the same effect as if it had been recited and set forth at large in the policy, where the latter provided that it was to be avoided if the representations in the application did not contain a just, full, and true exposition of all the facts and circumstances in regard to the property insured.

And in Bobbitt v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 66 N. C. 70, 8 Am. Rep. 494, an application was held to be part of a contract of insurance where the policy provided that the basis of this contract was the application of the insured, and if such application did not truly describe the property this policy should be null and void.

So, in Steward v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co. 5 Hun, 261, where the policy in suit provided that, if it was made and issued upon the survey and description of certain property, such survey and description should be taken and deemed to be a portion of such policy and a warranty on the part of the assured; and the policy described the property as "known as the Mackford Mills, per survey No. 18,611, filed in the office of the People's Insurance Company, N. Y.,"—it was held that such survey was not merely referred to Germania Ins. Co. v. Rudwig, 80 Ky. 223; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Thoenes, 26 Ill. App. 495; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 119 Ill. 474, 59 Am. Rep. 810, 10 N. E. 242.

Where the statements in an application and policy are such that the language cannot be given effect without assuming that the statements of the assured are intended as representations, they will be so considered, notwithstanding the policy states that they are to be deemed warranties.

Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rogers, supra; for a description of the property, but constituted the basis of the insurance contract.

But, in Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 452, 59 Am. Dec. 684, in which it appeared that certain conditions of insurance annexed to a policy and made a part of it required a written application for the insurance, which was to specify divers particulars relating to the description of the premises and the uses to which it was applied; and provided that a false description by the assured should avoid the policy, and that when the policy issued upon a survey and description the same should be deemed a part of the policy and a warranty on the part of the assured,—it was held that other statements in the application not required by the conditions or by the description of the premises were not made a part of the contract, though the survey was referred to in the policy in these words: "For a more particular description of said premises, see survey No. 74, furnished by the insured, which is hereby made a part of this policy."

A different result was reached in Sheldon v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 22 Conn. 235, 58 Am. Dec. 420, in which the whole of a survey was held to be incorporated into the policy, though the only reference to it was in these words: "Reference is had to survey No. 83, on file in the office of the Protection Insurance Company."

On the other hand, it was held in Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cotheal, 7 Wend. 72, 22 Am. Dec. 567; Snyder v. Farmers' Ins. & Loan Co. 13 Wend. 92, affirmed in 16 Wend. 481; Wall v. Howard Ins. Co. 14 Barb. 383, and Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, supra, that a mere reference to the application, without something further to show that it was intended to be incorporated in the policy, would not make the application a part of the contract of insurance.

So, in Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Monninger, 18 Ind. 352, it was held that, where the policy stated that, for a more particular description of the property insured "see application and survey, No. 37, on file at the Terre Haute agency office," this was not sufficient to make the application a part of the policy.

And in Newman v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 123, Gil. 98, in which it appeared that there was no written application, but that before the insurance was taken out the assured made certain statements at different times when he called at the insurer's office to insure the property, it was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held that a reference in the policy "to assured's application, No. 127, which is his warranty and a part thereof," was not sufficient to make these several verbal applications a part of the contract of insurance, especially where it was not shown which of these several applications was application No. 127.

And in Vilas v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 590, 28 Am. Rep. 186, where it appeared that the insured, upon the expiration of a policy of fire insurance, directed the agents from whom the policy was obtained to insure the property in another company; that his application for the expired policy was No. 1,234, and was on file with the agents; and that without any other application the agents procured a policy from another company, which, after a statement of the buildings and the amounts they were insured for, added the words "as per application No. 1,234,"—it was held that this was not sufficient reference to the application for the expired policy to make it a part of the new policy.

And in Clinton v. Hope Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 454, it was held that a reference in a policy to "a survey on file in this office" was not sufficient to make a survey for a former policy which was on file in the office of the insurer's agent a part of the new contract of insurance.

So, in Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 391, where the policy provided that it should be avoided if the assured's statements to the insurer as the basis of, or in negotiations for, this contract should be in any respect untrue, but did not specifically refer to the application, the court said that it was "far from ready to concede" the reference to be sufficiently definite to make the application a part of the policy.

In Miller v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 216, 7 Am. Rep. 122, where the application for the insurance comprised several papers headed with different designations, and the policy referred to one of such papers by name as a part of the policy, it was held that no other of the several papers going to make up the application could be treated as a part of the contract of insurance.

This note does not include those cases which, in determining whether the assured's statements in his application were warranties or representations, assume that the application was duly incorporated in the policy.

Messrs. Musgrave, Platt, & Lee, for defendant in error:

The statement of the assured in his application as to his age was a warranty, and was made a part of the consideration; and, if untrue, the policy was voidable at the option of the company.

The statement as to age being by the terms of the policy a warranty, its materiality is not open to question, since the parties to the contract have seen fit to make it material, the only question being as to its truth or falsity.

If the statement of age was not a warranty, it was a representation material, as matter of law, to the risk, and gave the company the same right, upon discovery of its falsity, to avoid the policy, as though the statement were a warranty.

Age is considered a material and vital fact for the company to know before it issues its policy of insurance; and a misstatement of it, either by way of warranty or representation, is fatal to the right of recovery on the policy.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit on an accident insurance policy brought by Mary C. Spence against the Central Accident Insurance Company to recover $5,687.50, which the company promised to pay to the plaintiff in the event of the accidental death of her husband, Robert Spence. The insurance company, by several special pleas, alleged a breach of warranty as to the age of the assured at the time the policy was applied for. The plaintiff below demurred to these several pleas, which demurrer was overruled, and she elected to abide by her demurrer. To the fourth plea, which set up that the assured in and by his application represented that he was sixty-two years of age, when, in fact, he was over the age of sixty-two and was of the age of sixty-four, the plaintiff replied, by leave of court, first, that the age of Robert Spence was not material to the risk assumed under said policy; second, that the understatement of the age of Robert Spence did not increase the risk or hazard of the defendant. The court sustained a demurrer to these replications, and the plaintiff elected to abide by her replications to the fourth plea, whereupon judgment was rendered against her for costs. This judgment having been affirmed by the appellate court for the first district, the plaintiff below has sued out a writ of error to obtain a further review of the judgment.

The policy and the application therefor are both set out in hæc verba, in the declaration. The only question involved in the record is whether the statement of the age of the assured in the application is a warranty or a representation. If the former, the judgment must be affirmed; but, if the statement is only a representation, the judgment will have to be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. There is a well-defined difference between a warranty and a representation in the law of insurance. A warranty enters into and is a part of the contract, and must be literally true in order to entitle a party to recover upon a policy of insurance, while a representation is not a part of the contract, but is an inducement thereto. A representation must relate to a material matter, and is only required to be substantially true. Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 119 Ill. 474, 59 Am. Rep. 810, 10 N. E. 242; Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Link, 230 Ill. 273, 82 N. E. 637; Metro-politan L. Ins. Co. v. Moravec, 214 Ill. 186, 73 N. E. 415.

In his application for the policy in question the assured stated: "I hereby apply for an accident policy, to be based upon the following statement of facts, all of which I hereby warrant to be true: My full name is Robert Spence; height 5 ft. 10 in.; weight 134 lbs.; age sixty-two years. My residence is Chicago, Illinois. My postoffice address is 122 La Salle street. My occupations are fully described as follows: Collector publishing house." The application also contained the following: "I hereby agree that this application and warranty, together with the premium paid by me, shall be the basis of the contract between the company and me; and I accept the policy which said company shall issue upon the application, subject to all conditions, provisions, and classifications contained in such policy or referred to therein, which I understand cannot be altered, changed, or waived by any agent of said company before or after the issuing thereof." If the language above quoted from the application was in the policy, or by reference thereto made a part of the policy, it would be much easier to sustain the defense than it is under the facts of this record. But these statements are only found in the application. A warranty, being a part of the contract itself as contradistinguished from a representation, which is a mere inducement to the contract, must necessarily appear in the contract itself. In Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robertson, 59 Ill. 123, 126, 14 Am. Rep. 8, this court, on page 126, said: "A warranty is in the nature of a condition precedent; it must appear on the face of the policy, or, if on another part of it or on a paper physically attached, it must appear that the statements were intended to form a part of the policy, or, if on another paper, they must be so referred to in the policy as clearly to indicate that the parties intended them to form a part of it. A warranty cannot be created nor extended by construction,"—citing Reynolds. Life Ins. 85 et seq.; Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 381; Burritt v. Saratoga County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Hill. 188, 40 Am. Dec. 345; Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cotheal, 7 Wend. 72, 22 Am. Dec. 567.

Defendant in error contends that the application in this case is a part of the policy. The only language in the policy that makes any reference to the application is found in the first sentence of the policy, where it is recited: "In consideration of the warranties and agreements in the application for this policy and of $25 does hereby insure Robert Spence, of Chicago, state of Illinois, by occupation a collector publishing house," etc. It will be observed that the reference here to the application does not expressly make it a part of the policy; nor does such effect necessarily follow by a fair construction of the language, even if a warranty could thus be imported into the contract. The doctrine of warranty, in the law of insurance, is one of great rigor and frequently operates very harshly upon the assured, and courts will never construe a statement as a warranty unless the language of the policy is so clear as to preclude any other construction. As was said by Justice Gray in McClain v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 4 C. C. A. 31, 110 Fed. 80: "The practice operation of such literal warranties is so often harsh and unfair that courts require their existence to be evidenced clearly and unequivocally, and are not inclined to allow it to rest upon a mere verbal interpretation where a reasonable construction of the contract as a whole will authorize a different meaning. . . . 'All reasonable doubt as to whether statements inserted in or referred to in an insurance policy are warranties or representations should be resolved in favor of the insured.'" By statute at least two states (Pennsylvania and Ohio have eliminated warranties from the law of insurance in those states, and the constitutionality of such statutes has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Warren, 181 U. S. 73, 45 L. ed. 755, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535. The usual method adopted by insurance companies to make the statements and stipulation embraced in the application a part of the policy is to refer to the application and by express terms make it a part of the contract, or they are declared to be the basis upon which the contract is made, or the policy is declared to be issued upon the faith thereof. May, Ins. 2d ed. § 158. Where this course is pursued, there is no room for doubt. A mere reference to the application in the policy is not sufficient. If the reference appears to be for a special purpose, and not with a view to import the application into the policy as a part of the contract, the statements it contains will not thereby be changed from representations into warranties. When the reference to the application is expressed to be for another purpose, or when no purpose is indicated to make it a part of the policy, it will not be so treated. Jefferson Ins. Co. v. Cotheal, supra; Snyder v. Farmers' Ins. & Loan Co. 13 Wend. 92; Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra. In Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 423, 59 Am. Dec. 192, Shaw, Chief Justice, said: "If by any words of reference the stipulation in another instrument, such as the proposal or application, can be construed a warranty, it must be such as make it in legal effect a part of the policy." The language in reference to the consideration in the policy in question is not contractual, but merely by way of recital. "In consideration of the warranties and agreements in the application and of $25" is no part of the written contract, in the sense that it embodies any of the engagements or agreements of the parties. It is a mere recital of a consideration, which is always open to contradiction by parol. Page, Contr. § 1203. The recital of a given consideration is not a promise to pay it. If it were, parol evidence could not be received to contradict the recital. It has been held in many cases in this state, and is the settled law, that a recital of a given consideration may be contradicted by parol evidence for all purposes except to destroy the legal effect of the instrument. Illinois Cent. Ins. Co. v. Wolf, 37 Ill. 354, 87 Am. Dec. 251; Morris v. Tillson, 81 Ill. 607; Koch v. Roth, 150 Ill. 212, 37 N. E. 317. The effect, and the only effect, of the recital in the policy, is to show that the company acknowledged a valuable consideration, which is so far binding as to preclude either party from destroying the legal effect of the policy by showing that no consideration was, in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact, given. Certainly a mere recital such as the one in this policy falls far short of an expressed stipulation that the application is made a part of the policy, which, under the law, is necessary before it can be so treated. The application itself cannot be considered in determining the preliminary question whether it is a part of the policy. This fact must affirmatively appear from the policy itself. It is only after it is determined from a consideration of the language of the policy that the two papers constitute the contract that the application can be resorted to. The application not being a part of the contract, any statements contained therein are mere representations, and not warranties. May, Ins. § 158. As such, they may avoid the policy if found to be "false" and "material," within the legal meaning of these terms. The materiality of a representation is sometimes a question of law, where the statement is made in response to a direct inquiry, or where by the contract the parties have settled the materiality by agreement. But this is not true in this case under either division of the rule.

The court erred in holding that the statement in the application that the assured is sixty-two years of age was a warranty. Such statement is merely a representation, the falsity and materiality of which are questions of fact, and should have been disposed of by the trial court as such.

For the errors indicated, the judgments of the Appellate and trial Courts are reversed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court of Cook County for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF INDIANA EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION, Appt.,

v.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

SAME, Appt.,

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

SAME, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY.

(— Ind. —, 85 N. E. 337.)

Express companies — free deliveries — Interstate commerce.

1. A state cannot compel express companies to make free deliveries, within cities of a certain class, of interstate shipments committed to their care, in view of the railroad rate law of Congress requiring the filing by transportation companies with the Interstate Commerce Commission of schedules of rates for transportation or any service connected therewith, and empowering the commission to determine what regulations in respect to transportation are reasonable, and to require the carrier to conform to such regulations.

Same — contract — violation.

2. A state cannot compel an express company to make free delivery of parcels committed to its care, in violation of contracts made at the place where the parcels are received in another state, that delivery charges shall be paid by the consignee.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Same — common-law duty.

3. The common-law duty of express companies to make free deliveries of parcels committed to their care is not such as to preclude them from fixing charges for transportation which will not include such deliveries, and requiring consignees to pay for making a personal delivery to them.

Same — statute.

4. A state statute requiring express companies to make free delivery of parcels committed to their custody for transportation is not in aid of the common law to such an extent that it cannot be said to be in conflict with the Federal statutes governing the regulation of rates of interstate shipments.

Same — free delivery — interstate commerce.

5. A state statute requiring express companies to make free deliveries of parcels committed to them for transportation is, as applied to interstate shipments, invalid as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce.

Case Note. — Statute requiring express companies to make free deliveries in certain cities, as interference with interstate commerce.

Aside from United States Exp. Co. v. State, 164 Ind. 196, 73 N. E. 101, no other case has been found presenting the question as to the right of the state to require express companies to deliver goods transported by them under defined circumstances and conditions as affected by Federal statutes relating to interstate commerce. At common law it was the duty, in the absence of a custom or usage to the contrary, of an express company, to deliver goods transported by it to the consignee at his residence or place of business. (See note to Hutchinson v. United States Exp. Co. 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393.) Indeed, that was the original purpose or object of the organization of express companies,—because delivery could and would be made in a different and, perhaps, more satisfactory manner than by the usual common carrier.

The question considered by the court in STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. ADAMS EXP. CO. was the right of the state to legislate in reference to deliveries by express companies as affected by Federal statutes relating thereto. In United States Exp. Co. v. State, supra, the right of the state so to legislate in the absence of any legislation on the part of Congress was declared. That case was, however, held not controlling because of subsequent legislation by Congress, which was construed by the state court to be an attempt to regulate the same matters as were formerly regulated by the statute construed in United States v. State, but which was held in STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. ADAMS EXP. CO. to be superseded by the Federal acts of 1906. The rule is well settled that, so long as state legislation, for the purpose of facilitating the safe transmission of goods and carriage of passengers, is not in conflict with any 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) valid Federal legislation, and merely intended and in fact operates to aid commerce, and expedite, instead of hindering, safe transportation of persons and property from one commonwealth to another, and creates or imposes no direct burden upon interstate commerce, it is not repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and may be enforced either as supplementary to congressional legislation relating to the same subject, or in lieu of such legislation, where Congress has not exercised its powers at all. This principle is not denied in STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. ADAMS EXP. CO., but is held not to apply because of the amendments of 1906 to the interstate commerce act.

While, as already stated, no other decisions can be found presenting the same state of facts as were involved in STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. ADAMS EXP. CO., yet the right of a state to legislate in reference to interstate commerce, where the burden imposed is indirect, and where the matter has also been covered in a general manner by congressional legislation, has recently been twice before the Supreme Court of the United States. While these cases are not strictly within the scope of this note, yet they are sufficiently analogous in principle to justify their inclusion herein. The first of the two cases referred to is that of Southern R. Co. v. McNeill, 202 U. S. 543, 50 L. ed. 1142, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722. In that case an attempt by state railroad commissioners, by virtue of a state statute, to direct common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to deliver all cars containing such commerce beyond their right of way onto a private siding, was held manifestly to impose a burden so direct and onerous upon interstate commerce as to leave no room for question that it was a regulation of interstate commerce, and amounted to the assertion of a power concerning a subject directly covered by the act of Congress to reg-

APPEALS by the relator from judgments of the Superior Court for Marion County in defendants' favor in mandamus proceedings to compel defendants to make free deliveries of parcels committed to them for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merrill Moores, Walter Myers, and John Ogden, with Mr. James Bingham, Attorney General, for appellant:

It is the common-law duty of express carriers to deliver express matter at the address of the consignee.

late commerce, and the amendments to that act, and as such was invalid because unlawfully interfering therewith.

The other case is that of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co. 211 U. S. 612, 53 L. ed. —, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214. In this case it was sought by a mandamus against a railroad company to enforce a state law requiring a common carrier to discharge its common-law duty to treat all shippers alike by resuming the transfer and return of cars, loaded and unloaded, between the line of a connecting carrier and a flour mill and elevator of a particular shipper. Such a regulation was enforced, and held not so directly to burden interstate commerce as to be an attempt to regulate it, within the prohibition of the Federal Constitution, because the regulation was simply the requirement on the part of the carrier that it perform its common-law duties; and it is on this ground that the case is distinguished from the McNeill Case. It was urged in this case, also, as a ground for defeating the state regulation, that Congress had already acted in the matter, and that therefore the case was not within the rule relating to regulation of interstate commerce by states where Congress had not acted in reference to the matter to which the regulation referred. In that respect it was claimed that the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and intrusting it with control over such questions as that presented, excluded state regulation,—the objection being much the same as that made in STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMMISSION v. ADAMS EXP. CO. Answering this contention, the court, speaking through Justice Brewer, said: "The fact that Congress has intrusted power to that commission does not, in the absence of action by it, change the rule which existed prior to the creation of the commission. Congress could always regulate interstate commerce, and could make specific provisions in reference thereto; and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

yet, this has not been held to interfere with the power of the state in these incidental matters. A mere delegation by Congress to the commission of a like power has no greater effect, and does not of itself disturb the authority of the state. It is not contended that the commission has taken any action in respect to the particular matters involved. It may never do so, and no one can, in advance, anticipate what it will do when it acts. Until then, the authority of the state in merely incidental matters remains undisturbed. In other words, the mere grant by Congress to the commission of certain national powers in respect to interstate commerce does not of itself, and in the absence of action by the commission, interfere with the authority of the state to make those regulations conducive to the welfare and convenience of its citizens. . . . Until specific action by Congress or the commission, the control of the state over these incidental matters remains undisturbed." In distinguishing the case under consideration from the McNeill Case, the court further said that there was presented in that case, and determined, solely the power of the state commission to make orders respecting the delivery of cars engaged in interstate commerce beyond the right of way of the carrier onto a private siding,—an order which affected the movement of the cars prior to the completion of the transportation. While the case then under consideration was said to present the question of the power of the state to prevent discrimination between shippers, and enforce the common-law duty resting upon a carrier; this common-law duty, the court says, a state may—at least in the absence of congressional action—compel a carrier to discharge. Justice Moody dissented, and with him concurred Mr. Justice White. Mr. Justice Holmes concurred in the prevailing opinion on the ground that the cars in question had not yet been appropriated to interstate commerce.

Gillett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals involve a single question, and will therefore be disposed of together. The state of Indiana, on the relation of the railroad commission of Indiana, has appealed in each of said cases from a judgment which followed the sustaining of a demurrer to the relator's petition and the alternative writ which issued thereon. Omitting the distinctive part of the name of the defendant express company, the command of each writ was as follows: "Now, therefore, you, the ——— Express Company, are hereby ordered and commanded to deliver free of any delivery charge, in all cities within the state of Indiana having a population of 2,500 or more inhabitants according to the United States census of 1900, in which you, the ——— Express Company, are engaged in the express business, and where you maintain an office for the transaction of such business, all express matter handled by you, consigned to persons living in any and all such cities, at the proper residence or place of business or other address of the consignee in such cities, according to the address furnished by the consignor of such express matter, or, on failure so to do, that you appear," to show cause, etc. The matters complained of relate, either to the imposing of delivery charges upon express matter delivered beyond certain territorial limits, to the refusal to deliver beyond certain limits, or to the practice of making delivery beyond certain limits by means of a local express company, which exacts a delivery charge. It is the settled practice, relative to the law of mandamus, that it is ground of demurrer if the command of the alternative writ exceeds the legal duty of the defendant as disclosed by the averments of the petition and writ. State ex rel. Good v. Johns (Ind.) 84 N. E. 1, and cases cited. If, therefore, it was not the duty of the companies in all circumstances to deliver express matter received by them free of any delivery charge in the cities described, the demurrers were properly sustained. Relator's counsel almost wholly rely upon the act of March 6, 1901 (Acts 1901, chap. 62, § 3312a, p. 97, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901), to support their contention that it is the duty of express companies to make free delivery of express matter in said cities; but attention is called to the fact that, according to the common law, it was the intentment of a general undertaking upon the part of such a company that it would make personal, as distinguished from warehouse, delivery. We held in United States Exp. Co. v. State, 164 Ind. 196, 73 N. E. 101, that an express company which refused to make delivery of express matter at the residence of the consignee, in a city of more than 2,500 inhabitants, in accordance with its implied undertaking, based on the receipt of a package so addressed, was liable to the penalty of said statute. It was pointed out in that case that there was no Federal enactment relative to the interstate shipment of goods by express, and we expressed our conclusion, so far as concerned the objection that the statute was invalid as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce, that it was competent for the state, under a penalty, to require such carriers to live up to their legal duties. Since the decision of said case, Congress has amended and supplemented the several acts known as the "interstate commerce act" (act February 4, 1887, chap. 104, 24 Stat. at L. 379, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3154) by the enactment of what is termed the "railroad rate act" (act of June, 29, 1906, chap. 3591, 34 Stat. at L. 584, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, pp. 392 et seq.). It is well settled that the amendatory sections of the latter act are to be treated, as to matters occurring after the enactment of said statute, as if said sections had been in the original act. Walsh v. State, 142 Ind. 357, 33 L.R.A. 392, 41 N. E. 65; Pomeroy v. Beach, 149 Ind. 511, 49 N. E. 370; Parks v. State, 159 Ind. 211, 59 L.R.A. 190, 64 N. E. 862; Given v. State, 160 Ind. 552, 66 N. E. 750. In § 1 of the railroad rate act it is provided that "the term 'common carrier,' as used in this act, shall include express companies."

As the command of the alternative writs in the cases before us to deliver free of any delivery charge is broad enough to include interstate shipments, the question arises whether Congress has not so far legislated upon the subject-matter as to forbid interference therewith on the part of the state, either by its legislative department, or by its judicial writs. In the section above referred to it is provided that the term "transportation" shall include, among other things, "all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing, storage, and handling of property transported." It is further provided in said section that "all charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof is prohibited and declared to be unlawful." Section 2 of said act requires that the schedules, which the common carrier is required to file with the commission, and to keep open to public inspection, shall show "all the rates, fares, and charges for transportation between different points on its own route." It is further provided by said section that the schedules "shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, . . . and shall also state separately all terminal charges, storage charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the commission may require, all privileges or facilities granted or allowed and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part of the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, and charges, or the value of the service, rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee." Said section law is unquestionably one within the competency of Congress to enact, under the power given to regulate commerce between the states. The state statute must therefore give way."

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 50 L. ed. 1011, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628, it was held that, under the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hefley, supra, a railroad company was not liable in damages for exacting upon an interstate shipment the rates specified in its schedule, although the company had quoted the plaintiffs a lower rate, and they had made sales on the strength thereof. The court pointed out that the clear effect of said decision was to declare that, whatever may have been the rate agreed upon, the carrier's lien upon the goods was, by force of the act of Congress, for the amount fixed by the published schedule of rates and charges.

But, aside from the general objection already pointed out, the effect of a requirement of free local delivery would be to make it necessary to adjust the interstate rate with reference to the fact that a local burden has been imposed on the business. It also appears to us that the mandate sought is open to the objection that it would preclude the imposition of a delivery charge where, by contract in another state, it is provided that the transportation charges shall be paid by the consignee, and also where, by such contract, it is expressly agreed that the delivery shall be made on payment of the general transportation charges plus a delivery fee. All portions of the transit involve expense to the carrier, and he can only charge reasonable rates therefor. Some idea of the importance of the factor of terminal expenses may be gathered from the fact that in Kindel v. Adams Exp. Co. 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 475, 495, the commission states that it fairly appears from the evidence in that case that the terminal expenses of the company aggregate about 25 per cent of the entire operating expenses of all kinds, including transportation. If the carrier cannot exact a delivery charge, or, what would be to accomplish the same thing by indirection, cover it in his general charges, it necessarily follows that the local transportation must be free, and that the expense therefor must be treated as a factor in and a charge upon his general business. As was observed in Re Exchange of Free Transportation, 12 Inters. Com. Rep. 40, 45: "It must be borne in mind that every extension of the privilege of free transportation casts an appreciable additional burden upon those who pay for their transportation, and thus contribute to the earnings that carriers are entitled to as a just return upon the capital invested. The 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) whole spirit of the act is that this burden should be distributed as equally and equitably as possible."

In Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 31, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, which was decided before the enactment of the interstate commerce law, it was held that that part of the continuous transportation of goods shipped from one state to another, which was within the state where the shipment was made, was interstate commerce, and that, as a consequence, a statute of the state where the shipment originated, forbidding discrimination in charges, was invalid as applied to such a shipment. In that case the court, referring to the commerce clause of the United States Constitution, said: "And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the states, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the state within whose limits a part of this transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce." After considering a number of its earlier decisions, the court said: "We must therefore hold that it is not, and never has been, the deliberate opinion of a majority of this court that a statute of a state which attempts to regulate the fares and charges by railroad companies within its limits for a transportation which constitutes a part of commerce among the states is a valid law." After pointing out the manner in which the regulation in question in that case would operate to circumscribe the power of the carrier in fixing rates, in order to avoid discrimination, the court, in conclusion, said: "Of the justice or propriety of the principle which lies at the foundation of the Illinois statute it is not the province of this court to speak. As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the state, it may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the state legislature to determine that question. But when it is attempted to apply, to transportation through an entire series of states, a principle of this kind, and each one of the states shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates, or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the states, and upon the transit of goods through those states, cannot be overestimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and cannot be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear from what has already been said. And, if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois court conceded it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eubank, 184 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 416, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, the court, after pointing out the manner in which the statute there under consideration might injuriously affect interstate commerce, added: "Other cases may be supposed where the effect might not be so oppressive. But the fact which vitiates the provision is that it compels the carrier to regulate, adjust, or fix his entire interstate rates with some reference, at least, to his rates within the state, thus enabling the state, by constitutional provision or by legislation, to directly affect, and in that way to regulate to some extent, the interstate commerce of the carrier, which power of regulation the Constitution of the United States gives to the Federal Congress."

It is our conclusion that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrers to the petitions and alternative writs. We may further say that it appears to us that, if the conduct of the express companies in respect to interstate commerce is objectionable by reason of a failure to pursue the course demanded of them by the alternative writs, complaint should be made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not to the courts.

The judgments are affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Gillett, Ch. J., handed down the following response on October 3, 1908.

In their brief on petition for rehearing counsel for relator state that it is the common-law duty of express companies to make personal delivery, except at small stations, and that the Indiana statute is declaratory of the common law as applied to cities of 2,500 or more inhabitants; and it is insisted that the Federal enactment was not designed to add to or take from the common law duties of such carriers. It is true that the courts have treated common carriers by express as analogous to common carriers by wagon, and, with the exception mentioned above, have held that it is an implication of their undertaking that they will make personal delivery. The authorities, however, seem to rest on the theory that this responsibility springs from the nature of the undertaking where otherwise unrestricted. Judge Redfield refers to the duties of such carriers to make personal delivery as the prima facie rule (Redfield on Carriers and Other Bailees, § 58), and the doctrine is so stated by Cowen, J., in Gibson v. Culver, 17 Wend. 306, 31 Am. Dec. 297. Judge Story says: "If there is any special contract between the parties, or any local custom or usage of trade on the subject, that will govern; the former as an express, and the latter as an implied, term in the contract." Story, Bailm. § 543. Angell on Carriers (§ 295) lays down the rule that, "when the carriage is by land, and in the absence of any established usage, or any special contract to the contrary, the goods must be carried to the residence of the consignee." It is stated by a modern text writer that "in all cases where a special contract or usage is shown to exist which relieves the carrier from personal delivery, unless the provisions of the contract are unreasonable, the carrier is not liable if delivery be made in accordance with such special contract or usage." Moore, Carr. § 28, p. 194. See also American Exp. Co. v. Hockett, 30 Ind. 250, 95 Am. Dec. 691; Conway Bank v. American Exp. Co. 8 Allen, 512; 2 Parsons, Contr. 5th ed. 186, 187. The case of Bullard v. American Exp. Co. 107 Mich. 695, 33 L.R.A. 66, 61 Am. St. Rep. 358, 65 N. W. 551, goes still further. It was there held that it was competent for a carrier by express to establish reasonable delivery limits within a city as against persons having knowledge of the regulation. The court said: "It is clear that a reasonable limit is not in all cases the city limit. Conditions are often varied. If not the city limit, can it be said that a certain number of miles from the office, in either direction, would be a reasonable limit? We think where the company, in apparent good faith, has assumed to fix limits, . . . that with regard to persons who have dealt with it, having knowledge of this fact, it is not bound to deliver beyond these limits." An analogous principle has been recognized as to common carriers by telegraph; for, although prima facie their undertaking is to deliver to the addressee or his authorized agent, yet their right has been recognized to fix reasonable delivery limits within a town or city and to impose a reasonable charge for deliveries beyond such limits. Whittemore v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (C. C.) 71 Fed. 651; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Trotter, 55 Ill. App. 659; Reynolds v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 81 Mo.

App. 223; Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Cos. § 196. Apart from the matters heretofore referred to, we have no doubt of the common-law right of carriers by express reasonably to fix their tolls with reference to the extent of the service to be rendered.

In view of the above considerations, it certainly cannot be said that the Indiana statute is merely in aid of the common law. On the contrary, if the statute is to be construed as relator's counsel must necessarily contend, express companies are, as it were, put into a straitjacket, being denied the right by contract or by reasonable regulation to limit their duty in respect to delivery, and being also denied the right to equalize their tolls by the making of fair charges for delivery beyond certain limits. Whatever may be said of the statute, if thus construed, as applied to intrastate shipments, it certainly cannot be said that, as applied to interstate shipments, it is not a regulation of commerce, much less that it could not come in conflict with the power of regulation which has been imposed in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It might be that the very practices complained of would commend themselves as just and reasonable to the commission, and that, if it were found that the companies were casting upon their other traffic the expense of long and burdensome free deliveries, an order would be made forbidding the same and substituting a reasonable regulation or practice designed to give greater equality. in view of all the circumstances, among the patrons of such companies. This very consideration must, in view of the railway rate act (Acts 1901, chap. 62, p. 97 [Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901, § 3312a]), operate to suspend the state statute, if construed as appellant contends that it should be, as to interstate shipments by express; and, besides, as we pointed out in the principal opinion, under the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, any state enactment which imposes a local burden of transportation which in its operation would require the carrier to adjust his interstate rate with reference thereto amounts to an attempted regulation of interstate commerce, and is therefore void as to such transactions.

On their brief on petition for rehearing counsel for relator say: "The opinion handed down in this case is based wholly on the construction by this court of a Federal statute which has not been construed by the Federal courts, the final arbiters as to such matters. This court has held as a result of such construction of the law of a foreign jurisdiction that the Indiana statute previously sustained is not effective." The above extract abounds in errors: (1) Our 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) holding is not based solely on the construction of a Federal statute, since, in the absence of such a statute, the act, as applied to interstate shipments, would, upon the construction contended for, amount to an attempted regulation of interstate commerce within the holding of Louisville & R. R. Co. v. Eubank, 184 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 416, 22 Sup. St. Rep. 277. (2) The Indiana statute has not been sustained by this court as applied to a case which is within the principle of this one. (3) The statutes of the United States are not, as to this court, the law of a foreign jurisdiction. On the contrary, we find it provided in the Constitution of the United States that "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof . . . shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

There is no ground for a rehearing; and the petition is therefore overruled.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

PARN KIRKPATRICK

v.

LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT COMPANY, Limited, Appt.

— Iowa, —, 115 N. W. 1107.)

Insurance — omission of application — breach of conditions in policy.

An insurance company is not precluded from relying on breach by the insured of conditions and warranties inserted in the policy by failure to attach to it a copy of the application, which is not referred to in the policy, although they are similar to those contained in the application, under a statute providing that omission to attach a copy of the application to the policy will preclude the company from alleging or proving any such application or representations, or falsity thereof or any parts thereof, in an action on the policy, but permits the insured to plead or prove the application or representation at his pleasure.

Case Note. — Failure to attach copy of application to policy as affecting right of insurer to rely on representations or warranties incorporated in the policy itself.

The only other case which an extensive search has disclosed in which this question was presented for adjudication is MacKinnon v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 89 Iowa, 175, 56 N. W. 423, which is fully set forth in the above opinion.

The case of Dunbar v. Phenix Ins. Co.

APP^{EAL} by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Poweshiek County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident-insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The application forms no part of the contract, but the statute does not prohibit the making of defenses based upon breaches of warranties contained in the policy.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On January 5, 1906, the defendant company issued to the plaintiff a policy of insurance for one year, providing that, for loss of life on account of bodily injury effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent, and accidental means, the company would pay to plaintiff $20,000, and for loss of either hand by severance, etc., one half of that sum. Plaintiff's claim was for $10,000 on account of the loss of a hand, within the terms of the policy, and $50 under a provision for the payment of that amount in addition for an amputation. The defenses relied upon were that the policy was procured with the fraudulent purpose of cheating the defendant by voluntarily bringing about his injury so as to secure the indemnity provided for; that the injury for which recovery was sought was not accidental, but was voluntarily and intentionally self-inflicted; and that certain material statements and warranties on the part of the insured were false, and that the policy was, by its terms, void on ac-

72 Wis. 492, 40 N. W. 386, also reviewed in KIRKPATRICK v. LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCL. Co., cannot be deemed any authority upon this question, inasmuch as the court based its decision chiefly upon the ground that the insurer, having made inquiries about the matters which it regarded material to the risk, and having failed to require disclosure as to encumbrances, waived that provision in the policy.

But in Wilcox v. Continental Ins. Co. 85 Wis. 193, 55 N. W. 188, also referred to in the KIRKPATRICK CASE, in which the policy in suit had been issued upon an oral application, the court said that, if the insured had "made a written application for the insurance in question, and falsely stated therein that there was no prior insurance or encumbrance, then the defendant, to make such misrepresentations available as a defense, would have been obliged, under the statute, to 'attach to such policy, or indorse thereon, a true copy of any application or representations of the assured which, by the terms of such policy, are made a part thereof . . . or referred to therein,' or be precluded from disproving the statements so made in such application upon the trial." Inasmuch as the policy itself contained provisions against encumbrances or other insurance, such language would seem to mean that the insurer could not rely upon the conditions expressed in the policy itself, where it had failed to attach thereto a copy of the application.

count of such false statements and warranties. The court submitted to the jury the issues raised by the pleadings as to the alleged fraud in the procurement of the policy and as to whether the injury was accidental or self-inflicted, but, by various rulings in striking out portions of defendant's answer, in refusing instructions asked, and in withdrawing certain issues remaining under the pleadings from the consideration of the jury, held that the falsity of statements and warranties on the part of insured, found in the policy, could not be inquired into, for the reason that a true copy of an application containing statements and warranties on the part of the assured somewhat different from those found in the policy had not been attached to such policy or indorsed thereon, as required by Code, § 1741, which, under Code, § 1709, ¶ 5, is applicable to policies of accident insurance. The section referred to reads as follows:

"Sec. 1741. Copy of Application.—All insurance companies or associations shall, upon the issue or renewal of any policy, attach to such policy or indorse thereon a true copy of any application or representation of the assured which, by the terms of such policy, are made a part thereof, or of the contract of insurance, or referred to therein, or which may in any manner affect the validity of such policy. The omission so to do shall not render the policy invalid; but, if any company or association neglects to comply with the requirements of this section, it shall forever be precluded from pleading, alleging, or proving any such application or representations, or any part thereof, or falsity thereof, or any parts thereof, in any action upon such policy; and the plaintiff in any such action shall not be required, in order to recover against such company or association, either to plead or prove such application or representation, but may do so at his option."

The policy sued on contains the statements and warranties on the part of the assured, falsity of which is relied upon by the defendant; but it makes no reference whatever to any application as constituting the basis for the policy or a part thereof. The application, so called, which plaintiff contends is such application as should have been attached to the policy by true copy, under the section of the statute just quoted, is not in the form of an application. It is headed "Daily Report for Accident Insurance," and purports to set out, among other things, the statements which the assured warrants to be true, and recites that "such statements are hereby made part of this contract," and it is signed by the assured, although, as it appeared from the evidence, it was intended to be signed by the agent.

But, in determining the applicability of the statute, we think this so-called application must be treated as an application within such statutory provisions. As counsel have presented a question as to the interpretation of the statute, which can be determined without particularly reciting the allegations as to false statements and breaches of warranties under the policy itself; and as it is conceded on both sides that the solution of the question argued as to the proper interpretation of the statute will dispose of the appeal,—we shall proceed at once to determine the question of interpretation thus argued.

The contention for appellee in the lower court and on this appeal is that, if representations or warranties were made in the application, a copy of which was not incorporated into or attached to the policy as required by statute, then no issue can be raised by the company as to representations or warranties found in the policy, although the policy makes no reference to such application; in other words, that, although there are statements and warranties in the policy which, without reference to the application, are material to the contract, the defendant cannot raise any issue under such statements and warranties relating to the same subject-matter, a copy of which was not incorporated into or attached to such policy. The appellant, on the other hand, insists that the existence of an application, not incorporated into or attached to the policy by reference, does not preclude it from relying by way of defense on falsity of statements or breaches of warranty available to it under the policy as delivered, without reference to any application which may have been made, but which was not thus incorporated or attached. Appellant did not, as the question was finally presented in the lower court, plead or attempt to rely upon the falsity of any statements or the breach of any warranty found in the application itself, but relied exclusively upon the terms of the policy as furnishing the basis for the defenses which it interposed in this respect. The section of the Code which we are now asked to interpret has frequently been considered by this court, and has been liberally applied in excluding an insurance company from relying in any way upon representations or warranties contained in an application, a copy of which has not been incorporated into or attached to the policy; and the purpose of the statute has been declared in a general way to be the prevention of any representations or warranties in the application being considered a portion of the contract, or available to the company as a defense, unless a copy of the application is incorporated or attached. Ellis v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 64 Iowa, 507, 20 N. W. 782; Goodwin v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Asso. 97 Iowa, 226, 32 L.R.A. 473, 59 Am. St. Rep. 411, 66 N. W. 157; Seiler v. Economic Life Asso. 105 Iowa, 87, 43 L.R.A. 537, 74 N. W. 941; Corson v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. 113 Iowa, 641, 85 N. W. 806. "An evident purpose of this statute is that, when the application is made a part of the contract, . . . a true copy must be attached to the policy, so that the writings composing the contract may all appear together, and that the insured may be in possession of the evidence of what his contract is." Johnson v. Des Moines L. Ins. Co. 105 Iowa, 273, 75 N. W. 101.

With reference to a similar statutory provision in Pennsylvania, the supreme court of that state has said: "It is well known that the evil aimed at in this legislation was the custom of insurance companies to put in their blank forms of application long and intricate questions or statements to be answered or made by the applicant, printed usually in very small type, and the relevancy or materiality not always apparent to the inexperienced, and therefore liable to become traps to catch even the innocent unwary. The general intent was to keep these statements before the eyes of the insured, so that he might know his contract, and, if it contained errors, have them rectified before it became too late." Lenox v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 165 Pa. 575, 30 Atl. 940. It is true this court has gone further than the Pennsylvania court in applying the statute, and has insisted upon compliance with it in reference to oral representations made to an agent. Ellis v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. supra. An earlier Pennsylvania case has already been cited with approval by this court in connection with the statement that "the effect of this provision is to exclude or eliminate from the contract all reference to an application a copy of which is not attached to the policy, and to render ineffective all defenses based upon anything contained in such application. . . . We are therefore disposed to hold that, if the application be not attached in obedience to the statute, the policy should be treated, construed, and enforced as if no written application had been made." Rauen v. Prudential Ins. Co. 129 Iowa, 725, 106 N. W. 198.

Nothing said in any of our cases gives confidence to the thought, however, that a failure to incorporate or attach a true copy of the application in or to the policy should preclude the company from relying on any defense available to it under the terms of the policy as to which no reference to an application not incorporated or attached by copy is necessary. There is no language in this policy indicating a purpose or attempt on the part of the company to make anything found in the application a part of the contract. The policy was complete in itself, and purports to contain all the terms and stipulations of the contract of insurance. If the company sees fit to ignore the statements and warranties of the application, and to issue a policy which purports to contain in plain terms all the stipulations and conditions of the contract, and such a policy is accepted by the assured as constituting the contract, we see no reason for holding that the company has, by omitting to incorporate or attach a copy of an application, debarred itself from insisting upon the policy as written as constituting the complete and conclusive contract between the parties. The assured has no cause to complain if the company fails to give any consideration to his representations and warranties in the application. The provision of the last clause of the section, that the plaintiff may, in an action on the policy, at his option, prove the terms of an application or representation not incorporated in or attached to the policy by the company, evidently contemplates that the assured may prove such application and representation by way of estoppel or waiver to defeat some defense which the company might otherwise make under the provisions of the policy. If the company has been conversant with facts which constitute a breach of a condition precedent, and nevertheless delivers or gives effect to the policy containing such stipulation, it cannot afterwards rely upon a breach of such condition precedent to defeat recovery under the policy, and the clauses of the statute referred to plainly indicate that the assured may prove the statements in the application for this purpose, although the company is not authorized to rely upon them by way of defense. Newman v. Covenant Mut. Ins. Asso. 76 Iowa, 56, 1 L.R.A. 659, 14 Am. St. Rep. 196, 40 N. W. 87.

But we have not given countenance in case to the thought that, for the purposes of precluding the company from relying on the stipulations and conditions of the policy, the plaintiff may prove that similar stipulations and conditions were contained in an application which the company failed to incorporate in or attach to the policy by copy. The contrary conclusion is plainly suggested in MacKinnon v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 89 Iowa, 170, 56 N. W. 423, where, with reference to this statutory provision, we said: "One of the purposes of this statute, if not the sole purpose, is to cause all parts of the contract of insurance to appear in or upon the policy. It is certainly not intended that representations appearing on the face of the policy shall also appear by copy indorsed thereon or attached thereto. It is only applications and representations of the assured that are made a part of the contract and which may affect its validity, and that do not appear therein, that are required to be indorsed upon or attached to the policy." And in that case it is held that evidence showing a breach of a warranty in the policy was admissible in behalf of the company, although it did not appear that there was not an application or representation on the subject to which the warranty in the policy related.

Counsel for appellee rely upon Dunbar v. Phenix Ins. Co. 72 Wis. 492, 40 N. W. 386, a case decided under a statutory provision similar to the one we are now considering, in which it was held, as they claim, that, if an insurance company fails to attach to a policy a true copy of an application which is made a part thereof or referred to therein, the statements made in such application will, as against such corporation, be conclusively presumed to be true. In that case the company relied upon the falsity of a statement in the policy that it would be void if the property insured was encumbered and the fact was not stated to the company in the written part of the policy, and it also relied on a representation in the application that the property was unencumbered. The evidence showed that the agent had inserted this statement in the application without the knowledge of the insured. And the court held that, as the agent had made an unauthorized statement on the subject in the application without calling the attention of the insured thereto, it could not rely upon a breach of the condition as to the same subject in the policy. This conclusion could well be supported on the ground that the unauthorized statement of the agent was binding upon the company. Hingston v. Aetna Ins. Co. 42 Iowa, 46. And it is to be borne in mind that in the Wisconsin case the application was, by reference, made part of the policy, and should have been considered in construing it, but for the failure of the company to attach a copy; whereas in the case before us no reference whatever was made in the policy to any application. But, without attempting to fully fathom the reasoning of the Wisconsin court in the case cited, we are clearly of the opinion that the effect of failure to incorporate or attach an application by copy is to preclude the company from relying on any representations or statements in the application for the purpose of making out its defense, and that it is still open to the company to make any defense it may have under the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

terms of the policy without reference to such application; and this seems to be the view taken by the Wisconsin court in Wilcox v. Continental Ins. Co. 85 Wis. 193, 55 N. W. 188, in which the company was allowed to rely on a provision in the policy containing no reference to any written application or representation of the assured. The Wisconsin case last referred to and our own case of MacKinnon v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. supra, are cited by Mr. Cooley in his Briefs on Insurance in support of the proposition that the failure to attach the application does not affect the admissibility of the policy itself, nor prevent the insurer from showing breach of conditions contained in the policy. 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 687.

The purpose of the statute being to require all the terms of the contract and the representations affecting its validity to be embodied in the policy, it would evidently be violative of such purpose to allow the assured to prove that oral or written representations were made in an application not incorporated in or attached to the policy as required by statute, for the purpose of defeating the provisions of the policy which has been issued and accepted as containing such contract, save as the right is preserved to the insured by the last clause in the section to prove such representations in order to show that the company has, by issuing the policy with knowledge on the subject, waived breach of conditions or warranties found in the policy.

No complaint is made of the rulings of the court or the instructions with reference to the submission to the jury of the issues as to fraud or accidental loss, as to which there was a verdict for the plaintiff. But, on account of the rulings and instructions withdrawing from the jury any consideration of defenses based on the conditions and warranties contained in the policy, the judgment is reversed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

C. L. VOSS, Cashier of Bank of Denison,
v.

E. N. CHAMBERLAIN et al., Appts.

Note — misappropriation — return.

1. The return by a bank officer to the private receptacle of a customer, of negotiable paper indorsed in blank which such official had wrongfully taken from such receptacle and pledged for his own indebtedness, and had recovered from the pledgee ostensibly for collection, does not render the owner a new holder for value, which will render his rights superior to those of the pledgee.

Same — indorsement.

2. The indorsement by the payee of a note, of his name under a guaranty of payment combined with a waiver of demand, notice, and protest, constitutes a blank indorsement, so as to pass title to one who takes the paper in due course for value.

Same — value.

3. One taking negotiable paper as a substitute for other securities held as collateral for a debt which he surrenders at the time is a holder for value.

Same — fraud — consideration.

4. A transferee of negotiable paper need not show that he paid for it in order to hold it against the payee, from whom it was obtained by fraud, under a statute providing that a bona fide holder for value may not recover against the maker a greater sum than he paid for the paper if it was procured by fraud upon the maker.

Same — misappropriation — priorities.

5. The rights of the owner of negotiable paper which is indorsed in blank and deposited in a receptacle in a bank for safe-keeping are inferior to those of a transferee for value without notice in due course of business, from a bank official who wrongfully misappropriates the paper and uses it for purposes of his own.

Same — defective title — transfer — effect.

6. One taking a pledge of negotiable paper from a bank official as collateral for his own debt is not bound to show diligence in ascertaining the official's right to the Case Note. — Rights of owner of negotiable paper, payable to bearer, or indorsed in blank, as against bona fide purchaser from one unlawfully in possession thereof.

It is not intended in this note to include cases involving the rights of bona fide purchasers of negotiable instruments fraudulently diverted; or cases involving the rights of a bona fide purchaser of negotiable paper from one in possession thereof because deposited with him by the owner as an escrow, to be by him held until the performance of certain conditions; or cases involving the rights of bona fide purchasers from one other than the owner, whose possession was obtained through fraud; or cases where the execution of the negotiable paper involved therein was induced by fraud. To be within the scope of this note, there must be lacking the element of voluntary delivery by the owner to the person disposing of the instrument to a bona fide holder. It is settled law that a negotiable instrument duly executed and delivered, and payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, will pass by delivery. There is but little, if any, question but that title to such an instrument will pass by delivery to a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, without reference to the title of the one from whom it was obtained, although the instrument may have been stolen or otherwise unlawfully obtained from the owner.

This doctrine was stated in London & County Bkg. Co. v. London & River Plate Bank, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 535, a case very similar, as to the facts, to VOSS v. CHAMBERLAIN. A servant of a bank abstracted negotiable securities from the vaults of the bank, and turned them over to a third person to be used in carrying on a stock transaction on a board of trade; the same securities, or similar ones, were afterward returned to the vaults of the bank, without knowledge on the part of the bank that they had ever been abstracted; the securities, when returned, however, were really the property of a purchaser, who had in good faith purchased them on the board of trade, from whom they had thereafter been wrongfully taken. It was held that, while a purchaser of the securities from the employee of the bank obtained a valid title thereto, because he was a bona fide purchaser for value, yet, when taken from him and restored to the bank, that the bank became a bona fide purchaser thereof, and was entitled to them for that reason, although it had no knowledge, either of the loss of the securities, or of their return. The decision was based on the ground that the bank, at the time of the abstracting of the securities, could have brought an action against the guilty person for their wrongful conversion; but this right was lost when the securities were restored; and the destruction of this right of action was said to be a value moving from the bank, making a sufficient consideration to bring it within the rule of a purchaser for value, without notice; and the fact that the bank had no knowledge of the transaction either way was immaterial.

In Whiteside v. First Nat. Bank (Tenn. Ch. App.) 47 S. W. 1108, it was said that the holder of a negotiable paper, regular on its face, could negotiate it and give good title to a party who took it in due course of business before maturity, although he had stolen it or was wrongfully possessed of it.

So, in Franklin Sav. Inst. v. Heinsman, 1 Mo. App. 336, where negotiable promissory notes indorsed in blank had been left with plaintiff for collection, and were stolen from it by a third person, who thereafter added his indorsement and sold them to defendant, who was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, it was held that title vested in the bona fide purchaser.

Walters v. Tielkemeyer, 72 Mo. App. 371, also holds that an unmaturing negotiable instrument, payable to bearer, or indorsed in blank, stolen and afterward sold in the usual course of business for value, the purchaser having no notice of the theft, passes title, although the thief himself had none.

Where a negotiable promissory note indorsed in blank was accidentally left by the owner in a broker's office, and was negotiated by him to a bona fide purchaser for value, the doctrine was enunciated that such paper as against the payee who has indorsed it in blank and left it in a receptacle in the bank for safe-keeping, under a statute providing that the rule that, when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated such paper was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove title acquired in due course, does not apply in favor of a person who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of defective title.

purchaser, in order to be entitled to claim the same, must show that it was taken in the usual course of business, and for a valuable consideration, without notice of any defect in its title. Merriam v. Granite Bank, 8 Gray, 254.

It is sufficient, however, for the purchaser of a negotiable note to show that he got it from the payee a short time after its date, and paid substantially its face in installments; and that he had no knowledge or information calling into question the payee's title until he presented it for payment at its maturity. Arons v. Ziegfeld, 52 Misc. 571, 102 N. Y. Supp. 898.

Under the Massachusetts negotiable instruments act, Massachusetts Nat. Bank v. Snow, 187 Mass. 159, 72 N. E. 959, held that a negotiable promissory note payable to bearer, complete in form and execution, was valid in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, although wrongfully transferred by the maker; and that the first sentence of Rev. Laws, chap. 73, § 33, which provides that every contract or negotiable instrument is incomplete and revocable until delivery of the instrument for the purpose of giving effect thereto, was inapplicable because the note had been executed and delivered.

Upon proof by the owner of a draft that it had been lost or stolen, the burden of proof is on the purchaser thereof from the thief to show that he took it for value and in the usual course of business. The fact that the holder is a banker, had a very large business, and therefore that it was difficult for him to show the facts of this particular transaction among a great multitude of others, was held not to change this rule. Kuhns v. Gettysburg Nat. Bank, 68 Pa. 445.

It was also applied in Poess v. Twelfth Ward Bank, 43 Misc. 45, 86 N. Y. Supp. 857, to a stolen certified check indorsed in blank prior to its theft; and in Marsh v. Small, 3 La. Ann. 402, 48 Am. Dec. 452, to a stolen check.

for value, without reference to any defects in the holder's title, was also enunciated and applied as to municipal bonds stolen from the owner thereof and payable to blank, the payee's name afterward being filled in by the thief, in Manhattan Sav. Inst. v. New York Exch. Bank, 170 N. Y. 58, 88 Am. St. Rep. 640, 62 N. E. 1079.

The doctrine has been applied to government bonds stolen after issuance. Jones v. Nellis, 41 Ill. 482, 89 Am. Dec. 389; Seybel v. National Currency Bank, 54 N. Y. 288, 13 Am. Rep. 583; Brown v. United States, 20 Ct. Cl. 416. In Com. v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 98 Mass. 12, 93 Am. Dec. 126, it was applied to state bonds that had been stolen from a holder thereof. It was applied in Garvin v. Wiswell, 83 Ill. 215, to county bonds that had been lost by the owner and afterwards came into the hands of a bona fide holder; and in the following cases to municipal bonds that had been stolen after issuance: Elizabeth v. Force, 29 N. J. Eq. 587; Boyd v. Kennedy, 38 N. J. L. 146, 20 Am. Rep. 376; Consolidated Asso. of Planters v. Avegno, 28 La. Ann. 552; and Dutchess County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hachfield, 73 N. Y. 226. In the last case the court said: The bonds were negotiable, and the rule is that the purchaser of such paper for value will be protected unless the circumstances are such that inference could be fairly and legitimately drawn that the purchase was made with notice of a defective title in the seller, or in bad faith. It is not sufficient that a prudent man would be put upon inquiry, nor that the purchaser was negligent, nor that he did not exercise a proper degree of precaution. A purchaser of such securities for value will be protected if he is honest and believes that the seller has a good title.

The doctrine has also been applied to bonds of private corporations. Mason v. Frick, 105 Pa. 162, 51 Am. Rep. 191; Wylie v. Missouri P. R. Co. 41 Fed. 623; Hibbs v. Brown, 190 N. Y. 167, 82 N. E. 1108; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110, 17 L. ed. 857 (bonds of joint-stock association).

Negotiable coupon bonds which were negotiable by delivery were held in Murray v.

Belden v. Hann, 61 Iowa, 42, 15 N. W. 591; Robinson v. Lair, supra; German American Sav. Bank v. Hanna, 124 Iowa, 374, 100 N. W. 57.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In April, 1903, one H. S. Green, a banker at Dow City, Iowa, acting as agent for the defendants, effected a sale for them of a tract of land in Nebraska, receiving in payment a small sum in cash and certain promissory notes which were made payable to "E. N. Chamberlain, Amos Weatherbee, and H. S. Green, or order." Green appropriated the cash payment and the proceeds of the first of the notes to become due in point of time, which he collected, to the payment of his commission, and turned over the other notes, of the face value of $4,350, to the defendant Chamberlain as the property of defendants, signing his name on the back of the notes to a stamped guaranty of payment, waiving demand, notice of nonpayment, and protest. In November, 1903, defendant Chamberlain, intending to negotiate the notes, indorsed his own name, and had the name of his co-owner, Weatherbee, indorsed, under the name of Green, on the back; but, as the sale of the notes was not then effected, they were replaced among the private papers of Chamberlain, which were kept for safety in the Exchange Bank of Dow City, of which Green was owner. At some time between November, 1903, and March 19, 1904, these notes were pledged by Lardner, 2 Wall. 121, 17 L. ed. 859, to pass by delivery to an innocent purchaser for value, although he purchased them from a thief who had stolen them from the fire-proof safe of the owner the previous night.

It is also applicable to coupon bonds of a private corporation, payable to bearer, pledged as collateral security for a loan to the thief in the ordinary course of business. Cochran v. Fox Chase Bank, 209 Pa. 34, 103 Am. St. Rep. 976, 58 Atl. 117.

Gibson v. Lenhart, 111 Pa. 624, 5 Atl. 52, held that the title to bonds of a railroad company, pledged by the owner, which were thereafter taken possession of by him and pledged to another who was a bona fide pledgee, and who was given possession of the bonds, passed as against the first pledgee.

In Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. v. Turnley, 61 Tex. 365, the court applied the doctrine to a railroad bond owned by a wife whose husband, without her knowledge, took it and pledged it as collateral security for his individual indebtedness contracted at the time.

The doctrine was also recognized in New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Mississippi College, 47 Miss. 560, wherein the court held that, in order that the loser of ordinary coupon bonds, payable to bearer, may be entitled to restrain the railroad company issuing the same from paying them when presented, and also to secure a mandatory order requiring the corporation executing the bonds to reissue other bonds in the place of those lost, indemnity in an amount sufficient to protect the maker of the bonds against the reappearance of the bonds alleged to be lost, in the hands of bona fide holders, must be given.

It has also been frequently applied to stolen bank bills and notes. Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 452; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 838; Worcester County Bank v. Dorchester & M. Bank, 10 Cush. 488, 57 Am. Dec. 120; United States v. Read, 2 Cranch, C. C. 150, Fed. Cas. No. 16,125; Robinson v. Bank of Darien, 18 Ga. 67; Olmstead v. Winstead Bank, 32 Conn. 278, 85 Am. Dec. 260; Sinclair v. Piercy, 5 J. J. Marsh. 63. The doctrine was also stated in First Nat. Bank v. Gates, 66 Kan. 505, 97 Am. St. Rep. 383, 72 Pac. 207.

In applying the doctrine to stolen bank notes, in Raphael v. Bank of England, 17 C. B. 161, it was said: "A person who takes a negotiable instrument bona fide for value has undoubtedly a good title, and is not affected by the want of title of the party from whom he takes it."

Necessity of original delivery.

A distinction is drawn in most cases between a negotiable instrument actually delivered for any purpose, thus being fully executed, and one not fully executed because of the lack of any intention to deliver it for any purpose. This distinction is drawn and applied in Hall v. Wilson, 16 Barb. 548, where it appeared that, after having drawn a negotiable note, the maker left it in his desk as a place of deposit, from which it was stolen by an employee, and, by him, transferred to one who claimed to be a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice. The case, however, seems to have been disposed of, and the transfer held not to pass title, on the theory that, if it had any valid inception, it must have been by reason of its delivery by the thief to the purchaser; and, as it had been discounted in such delivery to such an extent as to amount to usury, the purchaser was not a bona fide purchaser for value. The other objection, that such a note had no valid inception because not delivered by the maker, is also suggested by the court.

A very similar case, wherein the same conclusion was reached, is Burson v. Huntington, 21 Mich. 415, 4 Am. Rep. 497, wherein the doctrine was enunciated that delivery of a negotiable promissory note is necessary to its validity. That, while possession thereof by the payee is prima facie evidence of delivery, the fact of delivery may be disputed by the maker, although the note may have been transferred or indorsed to a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice. Considering this subject, it is said: "When a note payable to bearer, which has with any other rights than those which they had prior to the abstraction of the notes from the wallet by Green and their delivery to the Bank of Denison. The return of the notes to Chamberlain's possession without his knowledge, and without his having parted with any new consideration or voluntarily incurring any detriment, did not make the defendants new holders for value in due course.

The sole question to be determined, then, is whether, by the original pledge of the notes by Green, the Bank of Denison became holder thereof in due course for value and without notice of the wrongful act of Green in thus transferring paper to which in fact he had no title. The notes were not yet due at the time of their transfer by Green to the Bank of Denison, and the bank, therefore, took any rights which it acquired before maturity. But it is contended for appellants that it acquired no rights whatever because the notes were payable to the persons named therein or order, and were not so indorsed as that title would pass by delivery. As appears from the facts stated, the indorsement by Green when the notes were first procured by him and delivered to the defendants was by means of his signature to a guaranty of payment entered on livered or reissued. "They had run their career and fulfilled their mission, and had returned to the dusty depository of dead matter in the treasury; and they had been substituted by outstanding equivalents which represent the legal and moral obligations of the state. They had no longer any legal inception or existence as the bonds of the state, and they were and are as though they never had been; and their vitality could never be restored with intentional and voluntary redelivery by the state."

And in Dinsmore v. Duncan, 57 N. Y. 573, 15 Am. Rep. 534, where United States treasury notes which, on their face, were convertible into United States bonds at the election of the holder, were indorsed on the back by the holder thereof for conversion, and mailed to the United States Treasurer for that purpose, and were lost or stolen during transit, and the indorsement removed, it was held that the act of the wrongdoer was pure spoliation, leaving the rights of the parties wholly unaffected; that the thief did not, as in the case of stolen notes payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, have even the nominal title. The court said: "There can be no pretense of any legal ground upon which his act could destroy the plaintiff's right, any more than if he had mutilated the instrument or wholly destroyed it."

In other jurisdictions the same result has been reached, but the cases have turned upon the question of negligence of the owner or of the purchaser. Thus, in Scholey v. Ramsbottom, 2 Campb. 485, where the maker of a check, because it was made for an incorrect sum, undertook to destroy it by tearing it into pieces, which he threw away, which were afterwards picked up by a third person and pasted together, and paid by the bank, it was held that, under these circumstances, the bank was not justified in making payment, as the rents in the check were quite visible and the face of the check was soiled and dirty.

In Northern Bank v. Farmers' Bank, 18 B. Mon. 506, a torn bank note, which had been put together in such a way as to present upon its face unmistakable evidence of fraud and forgery, was held not to be valid in the hands of one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser for value, who had taken it in good faith as against the bank 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which had issued it, and which was the true owner.

But, where the maker of a bill, intending to cancel it, tore it and threw it away in such a way that it was afterward picked up by a third person and so pasted together that its appearance was as consistent with its having been divided into two, for the purpose of its safer transmission by the post, as with its having been torn for the purpose of annulling it, it was held, in Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. N. S. 82, that it was properly a question for the jury whether the bill exhibited appearances which would have led a man of ordinary intelligence to the conclusion that it had been torn for the latter purpose.

In Eckert v. Cameron, 43 Pa. 120, one who, before maturity, had discounted a note for the maker, which had been indorsed by third persons, was held entitled to recover thereon against any of the parties thereto, although as a matter of fact the note had been paid upon the day of its execution, and its reissuance by the maker was a fraud upon the indorsers and without their authority.

The doctrine that negotiable securities, although stolen from the true owner, will become enforceable in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, was applied in Rockville Nat. Bank v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 72 Conn. 576, 45 Atl. 301, and Ehrlich v. Jennings, 78 S. C. 269, 58 S. E. 922, to bonds issued by corporations, which had been paid before maturity, but had not been canceled, and which were afterwards stolen while in this condition and negotiated to bona fide purchasers for value, before maturity. These cases were distinguished from the case of District of Columbia v. Cornell, 130 U. S. 655, 32 L. ed. 1041, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 694, a case very similar as to facts, except that in this case the bonds that were paid were duly marked "canceled" across their face, which mark was removed by the thief before he negotiated them to a bona fide purchaser for value. The marking of the bonds "canceled" was here held to be a sufficient destruction of them to make their reissue under the circumstances of no validity as against the maker.

the back of the notes with a waiver of demand, notice, and protest. The names of defendants were, at a subsequent time, written by them under the name of "Green" following this guaranty. If it were material to determine whether defendants indorsed the notes in blank, or merely joined with Green by the subsequent act in guaranteeing payment, it might be difficult to say whether they became blank indorsers or only guarantors. But, according to the weight of authority and the recent holding of this court, the signing of a guaranty of payment combined with waiver of demand, notice, and protest constitutes the signers of such an indorsement who are payees of the note indorsers, and not guarantors, and, as no indorsee is named, such indorsement is a blank indorsement, and the subsequent delivery of the instrument to one who takes in due course and for value passes title. German American Sav. Bank v. Hanna, 124 Iowa, 374, 100 N. W. 57.

In determining whether the Bank of Denison became a holder for value, it is not necessary to consider the conflict in authorities as to whether a transfer as security for a pre-existing debt constitutes the transferee a holder for value, for the evidence shows that the notes were delivered to the Bank of Denison by way of substitution for other collateral which was surrendered in the same transaction; and, beyond question, a transferee who thus takes collateral by way of substitution for other collateral surrendered becomes a holder for valuable consideration. Park Bank v. Watson, 42 N. Y. 490, 1 Am. Rep. 573; Greenwell v. Haydon, 78 Ky. 332, 39 Am. Rep. 234; Cherry v. Frost, 7 Lea, 1; Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 114, 23 L. ed. 235; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 827. Since the adoption in this state of the negotiable instruments act (Acts 29th Gen. Assem. Laws 1902, p. 86, chap. 130), there is no question, however, as to a holder who takes by way of security for pre-existing indebtedness being a holder for value. By § 52 of that act (Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a-52) a holder in due course must be a holder "for value," and the term "value" means valuable consideration (§ 191), and by § 25 it is declared that "an antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value." In no view of the case, therefore, can the Bank of Denison be said not to have been a holder for value.

In this connection, it is contended, however, that, as the value of the collateral surrendered when the notes in question were accepted by the Bank of Denison is not shown, the bank is not entitled to recover because, under Code, § 3070, a bona fide holder for value may not recover, as against the maker of negotiable paper, a greater sum than the holder paid for the instrument if it has been procured by fraud upon such maker. This section evidently has reference, however, to recovery on instruments as to which the maker has a defense. The defendants in this action were not the makers of the notes which they are charged with having converted, nor are they sued as makers. There is no contention that any fraud was perpetrated upon the maker, and there is no occasion, therefore, to limit the recovery of plaintiff to the amount or value of the security surrendered when these notes were accepted by way of substitution. The indebtedness of Green to the Bank of Denison exceeds the amount of this collateral, and plaintiff is entitled to recover, therefore, if at all, in the full value of the notes converted. If the bank was holder in due course and free from defenses, it might enforce payment against the maker of the notes and the defendants as indorsers for the full amount thereof. See negotiable instruments act (Acts 29th Gen. Assem. Laws 1902, p. 87, chap. 130), § 57; Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a57. And the amount which the bank might have recovered on the notes had they not been converted by the defendants would be the measure of recovery against defendants for their unlawful conversion. The main contention for the appellants is that Green had no title to these notes when he transferred them to the Bank of Denison, and that the bank could not, therefore, acquire title or right thereto as against defendants, the lawful owners. The rule invoked is that applicable to personal property in general, that one who has such property in his custody, but without any title, as, for instance, a thief or the finder of lost goods, cannot, by delivery even to a purchaser in good faith and for value, transfer title which will be valid as against the real owner, who has not by any act of his conferred apparent authority to transfer title upon the one who has such apparent custody. This rule is applicable not only to goods and chattels, but to instruments quasi negotiable in character, representing property and intended to pass for it by delivery, such as bills of lading. Shaw v. North Pennsylvania R. Co. (Shaw v. Merchants' Nat. Bank) 101 U. S. 557, 25 L. ed. 892; McMahon v. Sloan, 12 Pa. 229, 51 Am. Dec. 601. But to this rule there is a distinct and universally recognized exception in case of current money and negotiable instruments payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, which are considered as standing for and representing money, coming into the hands of a holder in due course; that is, before maturity for value and without notice of defect in the title. In such cases the title of the holder is not dependent upon that of the person from whom the money or instrument is obtained. This is, as said by Lord Chief Justice Holt in Anonymous, 1 Salk. 126, "by reason of the course of trade which creates a property in the assignee or bearer," and this reason is repeated by Lord Mansfield in Miller v. Race, 1 Burr, 452, with the suggestion that "the bearer is a more proper expression than assignee," and with the more explicit statement with reference to bank notes payable to bearer that "they are not goods, nor securities, nor documents for debts, nor are so esteemed, but are treated as money, as cash in the ordinary course and transaction of business by the general consent of mankind, which gives them the credit and currency of money to all intents and purposes." Lord Mansfield in the later case of Peacock v. Rhodes, 2 Dougl. K. B. 633, stated the law to be "settled that a holder coming fairly by a bill or note has nothing to do with the transaction between the original parties;" and he continues: "I see no difference between a note indorsed blank and one payable to bearer. They both go by delivery, and possession proves property in both cases." And he adds, with reference to the particular case under consideration, that, as the jury had found that the bill indorsed in blank on which action was brought by a holder taking by delivery was received in course of trade, the case was clear that the holder could recover, although it had been stolen from a previous holder. In Miller v. Race, supra, Lord Mansfield further explains the rule with reference to bank bills payable to bearer, in answer to the suggestion that it was based on the lack of earmarks, which would limit it to money. "'Tis pity that reporters sometimes catch at quaint expressions that may happen to be dropped at the bar or bench, and mistake their meaning. It has been quaintly said that the reason why money cannot be followed is because it has no earmark; but this is not true. The true reason is upon account of the currency of it. It cannot be recovered after it has passed in currency. So in case of money stolen the true owner cannot recover it after it has been paid away fairly and honestly upon a valuable and bona fide consideration; but, before money has passed in currency, an action may be brought for the money itself." This reasoning of Lord Mansfield has received unqualified approval both as to money and as to negotiable instruments payable to bearer or indorsed in blank. In Saltus v. Everett, 20 Wend. 267, 277, 32 Am. Dec. 541, it is said: "A long series of decisions, beginning with Miller v. Race, 1 Burr, 452, has now settled the law that possession of such paper is presumptive proof of property, and that he who received it in the course of trade for a fair consideration, without any reason for just suspicion, can hold it against the true owner, and recover on it against the drawer, maker, and other parties, even if the paper had been stolen from or lost by the former holder; such former holder retaining all his original rights only against the thief or the finder, or whoever received the paper from them under suspicious circumstances." See also Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110, 118, 17 L. ed. 857, 858; Tucker v. New Hampshire Sav. Bank, 58 N. H. 83, 42 Am. Rep. 580; 2 Randolph Com. Paper, 2d ed. § 736; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 663, 729. If the bank took these notes in due course of business, its title was not affected by the fact that Green unlawfully abstracted them from the possession of defendants. Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. 545, 32 Am. Dec. 231; Greenwell v. Haydon, 78 Ky. 332, 39 Am. Rep. 234; 2 Negotiable Instruments Act (Acts 29th Gen. Assem. [Laws 1902, pp. 86, 87] chap. 130) §§ 56, 57; Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a56, 57.

It is argued, however, that plaintiff did not show the Bank of Denison to be a holder in due course, because there was no competent evidence with reference to one of the owners of the bank that he had no notice of the want of right or authority on the part of Green to transfer the notes by delivery, and counsel rely upon cases of which McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 390, 113 N. W. 858, and Keegan v. Rock, 128 Iowa, 39, 102 N. W. 805, are examples, holding that, as against a defense by the maker that the instrument was procured and negotiated through fraud or in breach of trust, the holder must affirmatively establish want of notice. But the cases thus relied upon are those in which it is held that, by reason of defective execution of the instrument itself or lack of assent on the part of the person sought to be charged as maker, it has not become a negotiable instrument to which the rules relating to indorsement and transfer are applicable. No such question arises in this case. The notes were fully executed and delivered as negotiable instruments to the defendants, and as such were held by them when they were abstracted from the possession of defendant Chamberlain and delivered by Green to the bank. The authorities already cited expressly negative any obligation on the part of the holder to prove diligence in ascertaining the right of the person in actual possession purporting to transfer title, and charge the holder with the defective title of the person making the transfer only where bad faith is shown. In the United States there has been a continuing conflict of authority on this question. See 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 996-1001; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1680. This uncertainly in the law has been remedied by the adoption in this state of the negotiable instruments act by which it is provided, in § 59 (Code Supp. 1907, § 3080a59), as follows: "Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but, when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he, or some person under whom he claims, acquired the title as a holder in due course. But the last-mentioned rule does not apply in favor of a party who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of such defective title." Defendants cannot, therefore, overcome the presumption that the Bank of Denison became the holder of the notes in due course—that is, without notice—by showing that the title of Green to such notes was defective. In other words, to defeat the title of the bank, defendants have the burden of proving want of good faith on the part of the bank in accepting the notes from Green.

A rule often applied in deciding a controversy like this, between a holder of negotiable paper and a party who has given it apparent validity in the hands of one transferring it without right, is that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by reason of the wrongful act of a third party, that one must bear the loss who made it possible for the third party to commit the wrong. It is not always easy to say whether, in a particular case, the one upon whom it is sought to cast the responsibility under this rule has done an act such as to charge him for the wrongdoing of another who has proceeded without legal authority; but the case before us is one coming well within the rule as often applied. The defendants held these notes payable to the order of Green and themselves and indorsed by Green. In this condition the notes could not have been put in circulation so as to come into the hands of a holder in due course without notice. Defendants intentionally indorsed the notes with the purpose that they should be negotiated, and, although this purpose was not at the time carried out, they left the notes in this condition, apparently indorsed for negotiation and transfer by delivery, in the custody of the Exchange Bank of which Green was the owner and manager. By this act of placing the notes within the control of Green, they enabled him to make a transfer of them by delivery as owner, and to put the Bank of Denison in such condition as to suffer a loss without any fault on its part if the apparent title acquired by it from Green should be held defective. It has often been held that, under such circumstances, the rights of the holder are superior to those of the previous party who has made the transfer of the instrument practicable. Emerson v. Crocker, 5 N. H. 150; Tucker v. New Hampshire Sav. Bank, 58 N. H. 83, 42 Am. Rep. 580; Cherry v. Frost, 7 Lea, 1. A motion of appellants submitted with the case to strike appellee's additional abstract from the files is overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

IOWA DRUG COMPANY

v.

WEBB SOUERS.

Corporate contract — execution — record.

1. Communication by one employed as manager of a corporation, to its directors, of acceptance of a proposition contained in its duly adopted resolution, that, in case of his inability to dispose of his private business, the corporation purchase it for a certain sum at any time before a certain date, is sufficient to constitute a sale without the necessity of entering the fact of the acceptance in the records of the corporation.

Evidence — corporate action.

2. Parol evidence is admissible to show formal action by the directors of a corporation upon a proposition which came before them.

Corporation — ultra vires — repudiation.

3. A corporation organized to transact a wholesale drug business, with power to purchase such personal property as may

Case Note. — Right of corporation itself to complain that property purchased by it was of less value than the stock issued in exchange therefor, in the absence of actual fraud.

Although the fundamental question involved in the decision of the case reported, that a corporation cannot, in the absence of fraud, maintain an action to cancel shares of stock issued in exchange for property, upon the ground that the property was not actually worth the valuation placed upon it, is presented in a rather unusual form, the rule that a corporation issuing stock as fully paid by transfer of property cannot thereafter treat it as partly paid, is well established by decisions of various kinds, of which perhaps the most numerous are those in which the right of the corporation to levy assessments on stock so issued has been denied. See Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 153, 26 L. ed. 973; Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co. 176 U. S. 181, 46 L. ed. 423; Northern Trust Co. v. Columbia Straw-Paper Co. 75 Fed. 936, affirmed in 25 C. C. A. 549, 53 U. S. App. 270, 80 Fed. 450; Great Western be deemed advisable in the conduct of said business, cannot repudiate a consummated purchase by its directors of the retail drug business of a person whose services they desired to secure as manager, after the value of such business has been destroyed.

Same — stock subscription — payment in property.

4. The trust-fund doctrine, requiring one paying for corporate stock in property to show that the property was actually worth the value of the stock, has no application as between the corporation itself and the stockholder who has received his stock in exchange for property surrendered at an agreed valuation.

Action — cancellation of stock subscription — subscriber's rights.

5. An action by a corporation to cancel stock on account of overvaluation of the property for which it was issued is not for the benefit of other stockholders, so as to permit an adjustment in it of their grievances for being induced to invest money in the enterprise through fraud.

(July 9, 1908.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the District Court for Polk County in an action brought to cancel shares of stock in

Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 63 C. C. A. 51, 128 Fed. 321, affirmed in 198 U. S. 561, 49 L. ed. 1163, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770; Gillin v. Sawyer, 93 Me. 151, 44 Atl. 677; Thompson v. Knight, 74 App. Div. 316, 77 N. Y. Supp. 599 (even though the corporation law prohibited the issuance of stock for less than par value); Orton v. Edson Reduction Machinery Co. 5 Ohio C. C. N. S. 540; San Antonio Street R. Co. v. Adams (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 639, reversed on other grounds in 87 Tex. 125, 26 S. W. 1040; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 842, 843.

It is also uniformly held that the corporation cannot refuse to deliver such stock or to recognize it as valid.

Thus, in Arapahoe Cattle & Land Co. v. Stevens, 13 Colo. 534, 22 Pac. 823, it was held that, where an agreement to compensate one for his services in securing a loan, by issuing to him stock of the face value of one third of the amount of the loan, was entered into in good faith, the fact that the result showed that the price agreed to be paid for such service was extravagant, of itself furnished no ground for releasing the company from its contract; the court saying: "We think the company might lawfully have agreed to pay him a similar amount in cash for his services, and we know of no reason why the contract to pay for such services in the capital stock of the company should not be enforced; particularly as no claim is made that any other creditor would be in the least prejudiced thereby."

And in Protection L. Ins. Co. v. Osgood, 93 Ill. 69, it was held that a corporation could not lawfully refuse to transfer, on its books, shares of stock purchased from one to whom they were issued in exchange for securities in good faith, upon the ground that such securities had subsequently turned out to be of little or no value.

In Roll v. St. Louis & C. Smelting & Min. Co. 52 Mo. App. 60, an action to compel a corporation to issue new certificates for stock issued originally to plaintiff's assignor, or to pay him the value thereof, it is said that the question whether the shares which had been issued in exchange for property were issued for full value was entitled to no consideration.

it was held that the conveyance of property to the company was a sufficient consideration, as between the stockholders and the corporation, for the issue of the stock as fully paid.

Other cases recognizing the rule that the corporation itself is bound by its contract whereby it has acquired property in exchange for stock are: Higgins v. Lansingh, 154 Ill. 301, 40 N. E. 364, in which the issuance of stock in exchange for an equity of redemption in property covered by a mortgage exceeding its value was held valid as to the corporation itself, there being no deception or concealment; Parmelee v. Price, 208 Ill. 544, 70 N. E. 725, in which it is said that, while a transaction in which stock was paid for property fraudulently overvalued was voidable as to creditors or other stockholders prejudiced thereby, it was binding upon the corporation; Hill v. Atoka Coal & Min. Co. 124 Mo. 153, 25 S. W. 926, 32 S. W. 111, in which it was said that, when a corporation issues stock as fully paid, it cannot afterwards assert the contrary, though only a small percentage of the value was in fact paid; Goodnow v. American Writing Paper Co. (N. J. Ch.) 66 Atl. 607, an action to enjoin the payment of a dividend on stock issued for property purchased, upon the ground that, the property being overvalued, there can be no net profits or surplus from which dividends can be paid, unless the impairment of the capital, caused by the overvaluation, has been supplied, in which it was held that a contract between a corporation and its stockholders, that the stock issued to them is fully paid and not subject to further call, is, in the absence of fraud affecting other stockholders, binding upon the company and its stockholders, although subject to attack by creditors; Boardman v. Keystone Standard Watch Co. 8 Lanc. L. Rev. 25, in which it is said that a sale to a corporation of property in exchange for its capital stock cannot be set aside in the absence of fraud, on the ground that the value of such property was not equal to the value of the stock; and Jenkins v. Bradley, 104 Wis. 540, 80 N. W. 1025, in which it was held that, where stock was issued in exchange for an interest in land believed to be much greater than it subsequently proved, the consideration for such stock did not entirely fail.

the plaintiff corporation; plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as refused it the full measure of relief demanded; and defendant appealing from so much as canceled a portion of his stock. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

Action in equity to cancel shares of stock held by the defendant in the plaintiff company. Decree for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. There is also an appeal by plaintiff on the ground that the decree entered in its favor does not give to it the full measure of the relief to which it is entitled. The defendant, having first appealed, will be treated as appellant.

Messrs. Brown & Dille, for plaintiff:

The corporate records do not disclose a sale, and these records cannot be disputed except where the evidence of the matter sought to be interpolated into the record is clear, satisfactory, and convincing.

Hawkshaw v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 29 Fed. 770; Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Manhattan R. Co. 11 Daly, 373.

A written instrument was necessary to the sale.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In February or March, 1903, the defendant associated with himself a few other persons in promoting the organization of a wholesale drug company to carry on business in Des Moines, which, as subsequently legally organized, became the plaintiff company. On August 26th following, there was a meeting of the board of directors of the plaintiff company, then duly organized, at which defendant, as president, and directors Brown, Wilcoxon, and Steelsmith were present. At this meeting there were some resignations of officers and directors, and the vacancies thus created were filled, so that from this date until March 13, 1905, the persons above named and Connell and Rawson constituted the board, the officers of the board being the defendant, president and treasurer, Rawson, vice president, and Connell, secretary. The defendant had been for many years engaged in the retail drug business in Des Moines, and, at the date of the meeting of directors above referred to, owned and was conducting a retail drug store. On August 27, 1903, at an adjourned meeting of the board of directors, at which all the officers and directors were present, a resolution was passed and duly recorded, reciting that, as the affairs of the company required the immediate personal attention of at least one person at that time, and the conditions were such that no one but the president of the company was available for this purpose, and the defendant, as president of the company, was willing to assume immediate personal charge of its business, provided he could dispose of or make some personal arrangement in regard to his retail business, he was employed as manager, to act in such capacity from and after the 10th day of September, 1903, until the company was ready for business, at a compensation of $250 per month, on condition that he give his whole time and undivided attention to the business; and that, in case he did not sell and dispose of his retail business to any other person, the company purchase his stock, fixtures, and business for the sum of $9,000, at any time on or before December 1, 1903, with the further recital that "the invoice price of said stock and fixtures is about $11,850." The record further recites that defendant accepted such employment, and would engage some person to manage his retail business until he could dispose of it, or the company saw fit to purchase at the price named, which amount he would be willing to accept if sold to the company. At the next meeting of the directors, on October 2, 1903, at which all the officers and directors, except director Brown, were present, by-laws were adopted fixing the duties of officers, and defendant was unanimously elected manager, Rawson assistant manager, and Connell credit man and head bookkeeper, and contracts with these persons for employment for definite periods, at fixed salaries, were provided for; it being expressly recited that, whereas defendant "has been elected business manager, and as heretofore on resolution of this board has been devoting his time and attention to the business of the company at the compensation fixed at $250 per month, therefore be it resolved that said employment, at the salary of $250 per month, be discontinued on 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the 31st day of December, 1903. That the president and secretary of this company be and are hereby authorized and directed that, in case said Webb Souers shall purchase and pay for capital stock of this company in the amount of $14,000, and shall agree to devote his entire time and attention to the business of this company, as provided in the by-laws, to enter into a written contract with said Webb Souers as business manager for a period of five years from and after January 1, 1904, at a compensation of $3,500 per annum, payable monthly, and upon such other terms and conditions as may be mutually agreed upon for the best interests of the company." At the next meeting of the board, held on October 8, 1903, at which all the members of the board except Steel-smith were present, the minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved, and the board approved a contract submitted, with defendant as general manager. It appears otherwise without controversy that the defendant subscribed and received certificates for $15,000 of the stock of the company, and paid therefor $6,000 in cash, with the understanding that the balance of his stock was fully paid for by the sale to the company of his retail business, including the stock and fixtures, at $9,000.

The plaintiff seeks in this action to have canceled defendant's stock in the company to the extent of $7,367.62 as unpaid for, the contention being that the sale of defendant's retail business, including the stock and fixtures, to the plaintiff company, had never been consummated. The lower court found that, although defendant had turned over to the plaintiff company in payment of his stock, in addition to the $6,000 paid in cash, the further sum of about $3,000 as the proceeds of the sale by him of his stock of fixtures, and had delivered to plaintiff unsold portions of said stock, the value of the stock so turned over fell short by $3,000 in value of the balance of his subscription, and ordered the cancellation of $3,000 in value of the stock in plaintiff company held by him. On defendant's appeal, it is contended that defendant's stock was fully paid for, and that the court erred in canceling any portion thereof; while on plaintiff's appeal it is contended that the court should have canceled $9,000 of value of the stock held by defendant, upon the return by plaintiff to defendant of the proceeds of defendant's retail stock, so far as the same should be found to have been received by plaintiff, and such portions of such retail stock as still remained in plaintiff's custody or possession. It is apparent that the controversy between the parties relates to the fact as to whether defendant's retail business, including the stock and fixtures, was sold to the plaintiff for $9,000, and whether, if not sold to plaintiff for cash, it was exchanged in payment for $9,000 stock subscription to the plaintiff, and being of less value than that at which it was thus exchanged, plaintiff is entitled to have the entire subscription for $9,000 in stock canceled, or to have an amount of stock canceled corresponding to the shortage in value of the retail business, including the stock and fixtures which had been transferred, or attempted to be transferred, to the plaintiff in exchange for stock in the plaintiff company. The principal contention for appellee is that no sale of defendant's retail business, including stock and fixtures, was ever made to the plaintiff company, and, if such sale was in fact attempted to be made through the action of plaintiff's board of directors, such sale was ultra vires and void.

It is conceded that the recorded resolution of August 27th did not effect a consummated sale, for it remained optional with the defendant to turn over his retail business to the company, or to dispose of it as his own property if he should see fit. But we think that the resolution bound the plaintiff company to accept defendant's retail business at any time before December 1st if the defendant should elect to dispose of it to the company at that agreed price, and that, if defendant did so elect, and advise the directors of such election, then the defendant's retail business became the property of plaintiff company, unless the transaction was invalid for want of authority on the part of the board of directors to consummate such a contract of sale. It is conceded that the records of the board of directors do not show the acceptance by the company of defendant's retail business in pursuance of the resolution of August 27th. But this we think was not necessary in order to establish the fact of a consummated sale under such resolution. Defendant had the option to turn over his retail business to the plaintiff company at the agreed price, if he should elect to do so, within the proper time, and all that was necessary to complete a sale and transfer the title to the property was the communication to the board of directors of his acceptance of its proposition. The evidence shows conclusively, if parol evidence is admissible for that purpose, that, on October 2d, before adopting the resolution authorizing the employment of defendant as general manager for a term of years at a fixed salary, on condition that he should purchase and pay for capital stock in the company to the amount of $14,000, and agree to devote his entire time and attention to the business of the company, defendant had indicated to the directors of the company present at that meeting his acceptance of the proposition for the sale, to the plaintiff company, of his retail business, in order that he might devote his entire attention to the business of the company. If there was any necessity for formal action by the board of directors affirming the sale to the company of the defendant's retail business after he had unequivocally accepted the proposition, then we have to say that the evidence shows that such action was, in fact, taken at that meeting, and not made of record. It is well settled that parol evidence is admissible to show formal action of a board of directors to have been in fact taken, although no record thereof is found in the minutes of its meetings. Selley v. American Lubricator Co. 119 Iowa, 591, 93 N. W. 590. No doubt, as has been said in Hawkshaw v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. (C. C.) 29 Fed. 770, proof of this kind must be so convincing and satisfactory as to leave no doubt that the matter attempted to be interpolated into the records of the proceedings of the corporate body actually occurred. But the testimony of all the directors, save Connell, who was deceased before the trial of the case, and Rawson, confirms the contention of defendant that such action was had, and this testimony is entirely consistent with and is in fact supported by the record as to what was actually done; for it appears that defendant agreed to give his entire time to the business of the company, and it is shown without controversy, by the records and otherwise, that he had made the disposal of his retail business a necessary condition of his undertaking to render such exclusive services. Rawson contradicts any such arrangement at the meeting of October 2d, but his contradiction is based upon the failure of the minutes to show the fact, and he admits that during October or November the matter was talked over in the store, and the defendant seemed to think the sale to the plaintiff had been completed. The subsequent sale of the retail business to one Hoover, apparently made by defendant in his own interest, the insurance of the stock in his name, and the subsequent foreclosure by him of a chattel mortgage for a portion of the purchase price, are explained by an arrangement, testified to by all the directors except Rawson, that defendant should thus act, apparently in his own name, though in fact as trustee for plaintiff, in order that the opposition of other dealers, with whom the plaintiff company expected to do business, might be averted.

If the sale of the retail business by defendant to plaintiff was in fact consummated as provided for in the resolution of August 27th, then the only question left for determination is whether plaintiff can avoid the transaction on the ground of want of authority of its board of directors to purchase defendant's retail business. The general nature of the business to be transacted by plaintiff is described in its articles to be "the wholesale drug business as it is usually conducted; to purchase, handle, and sell drugs, medicines, patent medicines, chemicals, druggists' sundries, surgical instruments, and such other lines of merchandise as may be determined by the board of directors or the managing officers." It is further provided that "said corporation may also purchase, hold, and convey real estate, and other personal property as may be deemed advisable, in the conduct of said business." Under this authority, the board could undoubtedly buy a stock of drugs and also druggists' fixtures. Whether they could buy a retail drug business as such, and continue to conduct it as a business, may be more doubtful; but there is nothing in the resolution of August 27th necessarily involving the carrying on of this retail business by the plaintiff company after its sale to plaintiff. If the board of directors, for the purpose of securing the exclusive services of defendant, saw fit to purchase his retail business with a view of adding the stock to its wholesale stock, and disposing of the fixtures as such, it was perfectly competent to do so, even though such transaction involved some loss in value. But in any event plaintiff is not in a situation to insist that the action of its board was ultra vires. The power which the board attempted to exercise was not contrary to law or public policy, and a corporation cannot rely upon the want of authority of its board to defeat a consummated transaction of which it has accepted and retained the benefit. Watts v. Equitable Mut. Life Asso. 111 Iowa, 90, 82 N. W. 441; Fidelity Ins. Co. v. German Sav. Bank, 127 Iowa, 591, 103 N. W. 958. It would be most inequitable for the court to hold that the plaintiff could rescind the transaction, on the ground of ultra vires, after the value of defendant's retail business had been destroyed, in consequence of the express request of plaintiff's board of directors in order to secure for itself the value of defendant's exclusive services.

We agree with the trial court in holding that there was no actual or intentional fraud committed by defendant in selling his retail business to plaintiff at the agreed value of $9,000. The relief asked by plaintiff is not the rescission of the sale on the ground of fraud, but the cancellation of so much in value of stock held by defendant as exceeds the value of the property received in exchange therefor. After defendant's retail business had been destroyed, the plaintiff could not put him in statu quo by tendering back the proceeds actually received by it from the appropriation of such business. Had defendant been guilty of actual and intentional fraud, the inability of plaintiff to put him in statu quo would not defeat its right to relief, but, as already said, actual fraud was not shown. The evidence tends to show that the stock and fixtures were not of the value of $11,850, which he represented to be the invoice price, but it does not appear that they had not been fairly invoiced, as substantially of that value, for the purposes of a retail business. The erroneous theory of the trial court seems to have been that where stock is issued in consideration of the transfer to the company of property of less real value than that at which it is taken, the transaction is fraudulent in law as to the corporation. The rule adopted by the court is based on the so-called "trust-fund" doctrine, in accordance with which a stockholder, seeking to escape personal liability to creditors on the ground that his stock has been fully paid for, must show that he has in good faith invested in the enterprise the value of the stock received by him, either in money or its equivalent. But this doctrine has no application as between the corporation itself and the stockholder, who has received his stock in exchange for property surrendered at an agreed valuation. State Trust Co. v. Turner, 111 Iowa, 664, 53 L.R.A. 136, 82 N. W. 1029; Esgen v. Smith, 113 Iowa, 25, 84 N. W. 954. In the transaction between the corporation and the stockholder the latter does not occupy any position of trust or confidence, although he may be a promoter or officer of the company; and, in the absence of actual fraud, the transaction is to be upheld, although it may subsequently prove to have been disadvantageous to the corporation. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968; Bank of Ft. Madison v. Alden, 129 U. S. 372, 32 L. ed. 725, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332.

The cases relied upon by the trial judge in reaching his conclusion, and now insisted upon for appellee as supporting such conclusion, are not in point. In Hallam v. Indianola Hotel Co. 56 Iowa, 178, 9 N. W. 111, it was held that a director owed to the corporation the duty of dealing in good faith with reference to the corporate property in the enforcement of a claim by him as creditor against the corporation, and, for his bad faith in buying the corporate property at much less than its real value, the sale to him was set aside. In Hinkley v. Sac Oil & Pipe Line Co. 132 Iowa, 396, 119 Am. St. Rep. 564, 107 N. W. 629, it was held that a stockholder was allowed to have his stock canceled on account of fraudulent representations of the promoters as to the value of the business in which he had been induced to invest. Other cases relied on for appellee are equally inapplicable. In Camden v. Stuart, 144 U. S. 104, 36 L. ed. 363, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585; Coit v. North Carolina Gold Amalgamating Co. 119 U. S. 343, 30 L. ed. 420, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231, and Coleman v. Howe, 154 Ill. 458, 45 Am. St. Rep. 133, 39 N. E. 725, the controversy was between creditors and stockholders, and the holdings simply were that, as against creditors, the stockholder cannot escape liability by showing payment for his stock in property grossly overvalued. This is not a controversy between creditors of the plaintiff corporation and defendant as a stockholder, nor between stockholders who have been induced to purchase in the belief that the stock of the company had been fully paid for in cash, and the corporation itself, with a view of the cancellation of the stock thus purchased. If the stockholders who became such after the transaction between the plaintiff and defendant was consummated desire to have their stock in the plaintiff company canceled, and the consideration paid therefor returned, their grievances should be made the basis of an independent action by them against the corporation, or perhaps against the promoters or officers of the company who, by fraudulent misrepresentations, have induced such stockholders to invest their money. The plaintiff is not insolvent, and is a going concern, and, as a corporation competent to make contracts for the issuance of stock and to act through a duly selected board of directors, it cannot complain of a transaction entered into in good faith, although, as the result of such transaction, it has not received full value in money for stock lawfully issued. Counsel for appellee insists that the action is for the benefit of the stockholders of the plaintiff company, but this is true only in the sense that any action of the corporation is presumably for the benefit of its stockholders. The stockholders themselves are not parties to the suit, and as such they make no complaint, nor is the action one in which any relief to the stockholders, as distinct in interest from the corporation, is asked.

The trial court erred in decreeing a cancellation of any portion of the stock of defendant, and on defendant's appeal the decree is reversed. It follows that there was no error of which the plaintiff can complain. The result is that the decree is affirmed on plaintiff's appeal, and on defendant's appeal it is reversed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

NELLIE K. BENNETT, Appt.,
v.
WILLIAM A. BENNETT.

(106 Md. 122, 66 Atl. 706.)

Will — caveat — dismissal.

1. After issues have been framed covering all the grounds relied on in a caveat to a will, and sent to a court of law for trial, the caveator should not be permitted to dismiss them for the purpose of filing a new caveat, without the consent of the caveatee.

Appeal — record — rules.

2. The court of appeals will not consider an objection based on a rule of the nisi prius court unless a copy of the rule appears in the record.

(May 17, 1907.)

Case Note. — Right to dismiss or withdraw proceedings to probate or contest a will or issues thereunder.

Although no other case has been found which places quite so much emphasis on the question as to what bearing the consent of the proponent of a will has on the dismissal of the action by the contestant, it may be said generally that, in a proceeding to contest the validity of a will, whether before or after probate, at least without the consent of the opposing party, neither the contestant nor the proponent has the right to suffer a nonsuit or dismiss the proceedings after the issues have been made up.

Thus, in Lasak's Will, 23 Abb. N. C. 54, 7 N. Y. Supp. 2, it was held that, after the parties to the contest of a will offered for probate appear on the return day, an executor has no power to discontinue or withdraw the proceeding without the consent of all; and this is especially true where, as in this case, he had duly examined the subscribing witnesses to the alleged will. This case was affirmed in 57 Hun, 417, 10 N. Y. Supp. 844, which in turn was affirmed in 131 N. Y. 624, 43 N. Y. S. R. 101, 30 N. E. 112, where the court took occasion to say: "In such a case, if all the parties cited, being of full age, should ask that the proceedings be dismissed, no one appearing in support of the will, it would be the duty of the surrogate to dismiss the proceeding. The same result could be produced if all the parties cited should formally admit that the will was not legally executed, or that the testator was incompetent. But so long as any person cited is before the surrogate in support of the will, he has no right, upon the motion of any other party, arbitrarily to arrest or dismiss the proceeding."

In Re Greeley, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 306, where two wills were propounded for probate, the beneficiaries in the earlier contesting the validity of the later one, the court, while recognizing that if all parties were adults they might enter into a stipulation permitting the court to admit the first will APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas permitting the dismissal of a caveat which had been filed to the will of Henry C. Bennett, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William J. O'Brien, Jr., and William Milnes Maloy, for appellant:

When a caveat to a will is filed before the same has been admitted to probate, the court has no power to admit the will to probate until the caveat has been disposed of.

to probate and withdraw the contest as to the other, nevertheless held that, one of the parties being an infant, neither the guardian ad litem nor his counsel could make any admissions affecting unfavorably his interests, and therefore the court must proceed to a decree on the merits.

And see the Maryland cases cited and sufficiently set out in BENNETT v. BENNETT.

In many cases the question as to the effect of consent of the opposing party is not raised; but on the ground that an action contesting the validity of a will is an action in rem the courts have, in the majority of cases, refused either party the right to dismiss his action or submit to a nonsuit.

In St. John's Lodge, No. 1 v. Callender, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 335, where the party proposing to establish the will moved for leave to take a nonsuit, which motion was overruled by the trial court, the supreme court in sustaining that decision said: "We are not sure that we understand what was meant by the appellants' asking leave to suffer a 'nonsuit,' as the term is not appropriate to proceedings in a court of probate. But, from analogy to actions at law, we suppose the object was to withdraw from the court before a verdict was rendered on the issue, devisavit vel non, so as to prevent the delivery of a verdict, and leave the party at liberty to institute another proceeding of the same kind. If so, we think it inconsistent with a proceeding of this sort and contrary to the nature of the jurisdiction of the court of probate. The instrument propounded is always brought into court in the first instance, and the jurisdiction is in rem. The inquiry is whether the party deceased died testate or intestate; and if the former, whether the script propounded be his will or a part of it, or not. When once regularly raised, the court must pronounce on those questions, without reference to the presence of this or that person, for the sentence, until annulled, binds all the world."

To the same effect is Hutson v. Sawyer, 104 N. C. 1, 10 S. E. 85.

So in Benoist v. Murrin, 48 Mo. 48. a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

suit for the contest of a will was transferred from the probate court to the circuit court. After the case had been pending for some time in the circuit court, and subsequently to the framing of issue, the petition was dismissed without prejudice to the contestants' rights and upon their motion. The contestees thereupon moved to set aside the order of dismissal and to reinstate the cause, upon the refusal of which by the circuit court the supreme court said: "The question here is—all the requisite parties being before the court, and every preliminary step having been taken—whether it lies with the contestants to defeat the whole proceeding by a voluntary nonsuit or dismissal. In my view every consideration of public policy is against the allowance of such claim. It is opposed to the authorities and in conflict with the policy and nature of probate proceedings of this character. It has repeatedly been held that the propounders of a will—those in the affirmative—cannot take a nonsuit, that it is the right of the contestants in such cases to insist on a verdict. . . . If the contestants may insist on the proceedings going forward to verdict, certainly those on whom is the burden of establishing an instrument assailed and drawn in question by the action of the contestants ought to have the same privilege."

To the same effect are McMahon v. McMahon, 100 Mo. 99, 13 S. W. 208; Bradford v. Blossom, 207 Mo. 177, 105 S. W. 289; and Cash v. Lust, 142 Mo. 630, 64 Am. St. Rep. 576, 44 S. W. 724.

It was also recognized in Bradford v. Andrews, 20 Ohio St. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 645.

In Hoyt v. Jackson, 2 Dem. 450, the court in referring to a peculiarity of probate proceedings which distinguishes them from almost all other judicial investigations, said arguendo: "When once an instrument purporting to be a will has been produced before the surrogate, and parties in interest have been summoned to attend its probate, it is no longer under the control of the persons who have propounded it. They cannot claim the right to withdraw it from the files, even though all persons interested consent to that course. Nor, on the other hand, can they, by

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record in this case that Henry C. Bennett, late of Baltimore county, died on December 28, 1903, leaving the appellant as his widow, but no children. One week thereafter a paper purporting to be his last will, and on its face duly executed and attested as such, was offered for probate in the orphans' court for Baltimore county. On the same day, but before the offer of the will for probate, the appellee, who is a nephew of the testator, filed a caveat to it, which was answered by the appellant on March 1, 1904. On petition of the caveator issues were framed and sent for trial to the circuit court for Baltimore county on March 1, 1905; the caveator being designated by the orphans' court as plaintiff. The proceedings were removed to the circuit court for Howard county on August 1, 1905, on the suggestion of the caveator that he could not have a fair trial in Baltimore county, and on the 2d of February, 1906, they were removed to the court of common pleas of Baltimore city upon the suggestion of the caveatee that she could not have a fair trial in Howard county. On January 23, 1907, the caveator's attorney filed in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas an order entitled in this case to "enter the above-entitled case dismissed." On the same day the caveatee filed in the case a petition and motion of ne recipiatur as to the order of dismissal. This petition was answered by the caveator, obtaining the consent of all such persons, procure its admission to probate."

In Roberts v. Trawick, 13 Ala. 68, it was said that the court acted properly in refusing to permit the proponent of a will to take a nonsuit with a view to revision in the supreme court, since such court is by statute required to proceed with the investigation and to determine the matters put in issue.

In Gilbert v. Gilbert, 22 Ala. 529, 58 Am. Dec. 268, it was held that after a will had been propounded, and an issue made up to try its validity, the probate court committed no error in refusing to allow the proponent to withdraw from the contest and become a witness in favor of the will.

So in Deslonde v. Darrington, 29 Ala. 92, where two executors propounded a will, it was held that, after an issue had been made up to test its validity, it was too late for either of them, at the trial, to renounce the executorship in order that he might become a witness to sustain the will, although the other offered to deposit a sum of money sufficient to cover the costs.

In Hogan v. Hinchey, 195 Mo. 527, 94 S. W. 522, it was held that the petition could not be dismissed, although the contestant stipulated in writing that she would no longer contest, and that she conceded the validity of the will.

However, in Crow v. Blakey, 31 Ala. 728, it was held that, where a will is propounded for probate and contested by one of the heirs at law and distributees, the court may allow the proponent, on the day set for hearing, to withdraw his application, the contest being considered a proceeding inter partes.

In Heermans v. Hill, 4 Thomp. & C. 602, it was held to be within the power of a surrogate court to permit the proponent of a will to withdraw it from probate.

The right to withdraw a caveat by a caveator was recognized, also, in Thurston v. Gough, 42 N. J. Eq. 346, 7 Atl. 573.

In Wait v. Westfall, 161 Ind. 648, 68 N. E. 271, it was held that the voluntary dismissal of a suit to contest a will which had been admitted to probate will not preclude the bringing of another suit within the statute. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

utory period of limitations. The court in this case said: "A period of three years is given a plaintiff for investigation and decision. He may begin at any time within the period, and carry the proceeding forward to final judgment even after the period has expired. And we find nothing in the statute or in the nature of the action to prevent him from dismissing his suit as any other plaintiff, without prejudice, if before trial he becomes convinced that the facts or witnesses relied upon are untrustworthy or insufficient to entitle him to recover. Nor do we find anything in the statute to prevent him from renewing the same at any time within the statutory period, if, from the discovery of new facts or witnesses, he desires to do so."

If the citations have not yet been issued or the issues made up, the courts do not seem to deny a party to a contest of a will the right to dismiss or withdraw the proceedings or suffer a nonsuit.

Thus, in Re Fisher, 49 N. J. Eq. 517, 24 Atl. 1019, it was held, where a caveat is filed with the surrogate and the will subsequently propounded to him for probate, the proponent may, before citations have been issued, withdraw his application without prejudice to a new application to the ordinary, who has concurrent jurisdiction with the surrogate and orphans' court of such matters.

So in Re Leonard (N. J.) 47 Atl. 222, it was held that a proponent of a will, having the right to withdraw application to the surrogate for probate before citations are issued, may do so where the citations name as return day a day already passed, they having no force.

In Wehe v. Mood, 68 Kan. 373, 75 Pac. 476, it was held that under a statute permitting the dismissal of an action without prejudice to a future action, by the plaintiff, before the final submission of the case to the jury, one of the contestants had the right, before the case was finally submitted, to have the action dismissed as to herself without prejudice.

In Osborne v. Davies, 60 Kan. 695, 57 Pac. 941, it was held error to refuse the contestant of a will permission to dismiss his ac-and upon a hearing of the matter the court passed an order overruling the motion and dismissing the petition, and the caveatee appealed from the order. Before the passing of the order appealed from, the caveator gave notice to the orphans' court of Baltimore county of his intention to file another caveat to the will.

The single issue raised by the appeal is whether the caveator was entitled to dismiss the caveat at the stage of the proceedings at which he filed the order for that purpose, without the consent of the caveatee. The precise question of the extent of a caveator's right to dismiss the entire proceedings upon a caveat filed by him against the objections of the caveatee, after an answer has been filed to the caveat and issues sent to a court of law for trial, has not, we believe, been passed upon by this court. There have been, however, a number of cases decided by us sufficiently similar to the one at bar to throw much light upon the principles involved in its determination. The right of the plaintiff, as a general rule, in an action at law, to dismiss the case or suffer a nonsuit at any time before verdict, has long been recognized; but in suits in equity this court, in the case of Riley v. First Nat. Bank, 81 Md. 26, 31 Atl. 585, held after careful consideration that the plaintiff had no such unrestricted right of dismissal. It was said in that case: "After a bill has been filed and proceedings had under it, when counsel have appeared and costs have been incurred, it would be an unfair advantage to allow the plaintiff's attorney the right to dismiss his client's complaint as to parties, either plaintiff or defendant, without the previous sanction of the court." In support of the views thus expressed the court cited Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 790; Wiswell v. Starr, 50 Me. 384; and Camden & A. R. Co. v. Stewart, 19 N. J. Eq. 69.

tion, it appearing that the court had submitted to the jury certain particular questions of fact which covered only part of the issues.

In Storey v. Storey, 30 App. D. C. 41, it was held not error to overrule a caveator's motion, on the day fixed for the trial of issues framed to test the validity of a will, to assign a later day for trial, on the ground that a copy of the issues and notice of trial had not been served on him, where it appeared that, at the time the issues were framed and the date of trial fixed, the caveator appeared in person and by attorney.

The following cases, although of some interest, yet are not strictly in point with this note, and no effort has been made to make this class exhaustive. Among these cases is Slocum v. Grandin, 38 N. J. Eq. 485, affirmed in 40 N. J. Eq. 342, where the court, after expressly saying that its decision did not depend upon the question whether

In Price v. Taylor, 21 Md. 356, where issues upon a caveat to a will were dismissed upon the ex parte order of the caveator, filed in the court of law where they had gone for trial, the court, in discussing his right to discontinue the proceeding, applied to the case the ordinary rule in actions at law, that the plaintiff may discontinue the suit at any time by a written order to the clerk to that effect. But in that case the court said, in its opinion, on page 364: "We do not intend to say, however, that parties plaintiff would always have the right to dismiss issues without trial." In Levy v. Levy, 28 Md. 25, the court, relying on the decision in Price v. Taylor, supra, again applied to issues under a caveat to a will the rule applicable to actions at law, and held that a caveator might dismiss the issues upon the caveat by an order to that effect filed in the case. It is to be observed, however, that neither in Price v. Taylor nor Levy v. Levy did the caveatee object to, or attempt to prevent, the dismissal of the issues, or show cause why it ought not to have been permitted. In the Berry Will Case, 93 Md. 560, 49 Atl. 401, we have for the first time an attempt by a caveator to dismiss issues, over the objection of the caveatee, in the court of law to which they had been sent for trial. The lower court in that case permitted the dismissal, and this court upon appeal reversed the action of the lower court. It is true that Berry's Case differs from the one at bar, in that there the effort was to dismiss only certain ones, and not all, of the issues, and that the effort was made during the trial of the case after the jury had been sworn; but the reasoning there employed by the court applies with great force to the situation presented by the record now before us. We said in Berry's Case: "The right of a plaintiff to discontinue a case er or not the caveator had full control over the caveat, and could withdraw or subduct it at his pleasure, held that after a surrogate's jurisdiction over the probate of a will has been taken away by the filing of a caveat thereto, and the orphans' court has made an order fixing a time for hearing upon the caveat, the surrogate's jurisdiction is not restored merely by the withdrawing of the caveat.

In Dillard v. Dillard, 78 Va. 208, it was held that the withdrawal of a motion to contest a will by a contestant before probate would not preclude him from again contesting the will after probate.

Validity of agreement to defeat probate of will, see case note to Cochran v. Zachary, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 235.

after it has been instituted is not absolute. Riley v. First Nat. Bank, 81 Md. 14, 31 Atl. 585. 'We don't intend, however,' observed this court in Price v. Taylor, supra, 'to say that parties plaintiff could always have the right to dismiss issues without trial.' In Pegg v. Warford, 4 Md. 385, it was held that the orphans' court had no power to revoke an issue which had been sent to the superior court for trial; but 'that by consent of the parties to the proceeding' the issues may 'be abandoned in the court of law where they are pending for trial,' and others may be framed by the orphans' court." After observing that it would be subversive of sound policy in the administration of justice to permit the caveators to dismiss a portion of the issues during the trial of the case, as was there attempted to be done, it is further said in the opinion in Berry's Case: "The issues having been made up by the orphans' court, and having been sent to a court of law for trial, neither side to the contest has control of them; and, unless they are disposed of by consent or are all dismissed, they must be tried, and part of them cannot be withdrawn by either contestant."

All that we decided or were called upon to decide in that case, in reference to the power of a caveator to dismiss issues after they had been sent to a court of law, was that he had no right to make the partial dismissal of them which he there attempted. But the conclusions to which expression was given in the opinion, that the right of a plaintiff to dismiss issues without trial is not absolute, and that after issues have been made up by the orphans' court and sent to a court of law for trial neither side to the contest has control of them, embody propositions conducive to the orderly and efficient administration of justice, which apply with special propriety to the regulation of proceedings founded on caveats to wills under our testamentary system. Although issues framed on caveats are triable in courts of law, their trial differs from the ordinary action at law between opposing suitors, in that it is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and each side bears a part of the burden of proof. Cecil v. Cecil, 19 Md. 80, 81 Am. Dec. 626; Levy v. Levy, 28 Md. 31. Furthermore, other persons than the parties to the proceeding, such as creditors, heirs at law, next of kin, legatees, devisees, may be and usually are directly interested in the result of the caveat. For these reasons, and because a sound public policy requires that the settlement of the estates of deceased persons be made without unreasonable expense or delay, we are of opinion that, after issues have been framed, covering all of the grounds relied on in a caveat to a will, and sent to a court of law for trial, the caveator should not be permitted to dismiss them for the purpose of filing a new caveat, without the consent of the caveatee.

In the present case the caveat, alleging undue influence, want of testamentary capacity, and other grounds, was filed on January 4, 1904, and issues fully covering all of the reasons alleged in the caveat for refusing probate of the alleged will were sent by the orphans' court to a court of law on March 1st of the same year. After various delays covering a period of nearly three years, and when the issues had been specially set for trial on a particular day, the attorney for the caveator filed in the clerk's office the order to dismiss, and at once, and before the will could be again presented to the orphans' court for probate, he gave notice to that court of his intention to file another caveat, and admitted to the caveatee's attorney that he intended to ask for issues on the new caveat to be sent to a court of law. By that time the administration of the estate had already been prevented for fully three years from the offer of the will for probate. It appears from the record that in the meantime the creditors of the testator had filed a bill in equity for the sale of his real estate for the payment of his debts, and receivers had been appointed in that suit, who were in charge of the property. In these circumstances, as the caveator had not under the decisions of this court an absolute right to dismiss the issues, the court below should have granted the appellant's motion ne recipiatur, and stricken out the entry of dismissal made by the clerk on the caveator's order, and required the case to proceed to trial in due course. If the appellee were accorded the right to dismiss at will the issues on his caveat after they had been in the court of law for nearly two years, and at the same moment file another caveat, he might by a capricious exercise of that right indefinitely postpone the administration of the estate, to the great inconvenience and injury of other persons interested therein, who would be without remedy. Such persons, not being parties to the proceedings, would not be entitled to costs against the appellee, and would not even receive that compensation which, though often meager in fact, has in a legal sense been held to be adequate for the inconvenience of double litigation.

At the hearing in this court the appellee insisted that, under the 16th rule of the court of common pleas, which provides that the court will not hear any motion grounded on facts unless the facts are apparent from the record, or verified by oath, or agreed upon by the parties, the appellant was not entitled to have her motion re oipiatur considered. The answer to that objection is twofold. In the first place, a copy of the rule does not appear in the record; and, in the second place, in passing upon the motion we have considered only facts appearing from the record or the written agreement of the parties found therein, without reference to the reasons de hors the record set forth in the motion.

For the reasons stated in this opinion, the order appealed from must be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Order reversed, with costs, and case remanded for further proceedings.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

RICHARD C. DAVIS.

Limitation of action — account — single transaction.

A single transaction on an account which has been dormant less than the statutory period, consisting of the debit of a small item and the credit of the amount necessary to cancel it a short time afterwards, is sufficient to bring the account within the operation of a statute providing that the Case Note. — Effect of specific application of payment to last item of open account upon the statute of limitations.

The consideration of the question as presented by this note necessarily proceeds upon the assumption that the account is of such a nature that, in an action to recover the items as represented by the account, the statute of limitations as to all items would be held to run from the date of the last item.

Notwithstanding that the question would seem to be a very common one in practical affairs, and likely to arise under many circumstances, very little authority has been found which tends in any way towards its solution.

An interesting case on this question, and one more nearly approaching ROGERS v. DAVIS than any other found, is Rickard v. Geach, 26 Nev. 444, 69 Pac. 861. Here an open mutual and current account sued on would have been barred by limitations but for the last two items, one a very small item and charged to defendant on his own credit and the other a larger one upon the guaranty of a third person. Thereafter the creditor presented to such guarantor a bill for both items, and the latter, without knowing that the smaller item was included, paid the whole bill, upon which the defend-cause of action on mutual accounts shall be deemed to accrue at the time of the last item proved in such account.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Piscataquis County made during the trial of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an account, which resulted in a judgment in defendant's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hudson & Hudson for plaintiff.

Mr. John S. Williams for defendant.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of assumpsit upon an account. The writ was dated December 19, 1905. Plea, the statute of limitations. The account opened January 13, 1894, and until December 17, 1898, was admittedly a mutual and unsettled account, with items both of debit and credit. The case was sent to an auditor, who reported that, after December 17, 1898, there were only two entries made on the account, namely, a charge of 20 cents for tobacco, on November 15, 1902, and a credit of cash 20 cents December 15, 1902. And he reported, further, that the cash payment of December 15, 1902, was made for the express purpose of paying for the tobacco charged thirty days before. Thereupon the ant was credited on the account with a cash payment for the amount as represented by the bill. In an effort to collect the remainder of the account, it was insisted by the defendant that the payment and receipt of the small item as above stated so eliminated that item as to let in the bar of the statute of limitations as to the old account. The court, however, thought otherwise on the ground that it could not be presumed that the plaintiff put that item on the bill and thereby intentionally let in the bar of the statute for a claim many times larger, and also that neither the guarantor nor the defendant could have had that intention, since the one thought it was part of his bill and the other had nothing to do with putting it thereon; and that, if the plaintiff did wrong in putting the small item on the bill, it was a wrong against the guarantor, and not against the defendant.

In Hodge v. Manley, 25 Vt. 210, 60 Am. Dec. 253, where the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for store, blacksmithing, and postoffice accounts, all of which were treated as one account, it was held that payment made under specific application to the postoffice accounts only, without any circumstances showing a recognition of any other dealing between them, or of an open and subsisting account, was insufficient to prevent the statute of limitations from barring auditor found that the account was barred by the statute of limitations, "unless renewed by the transactions of November 15 and December 15, 1902." But, if renewed, he found there was due the plaintiff from the defendant the sum of $169.45. The case was heard before the presiding justice, who, on the facts stated by the auditor, ordered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff excepted.

It is well to observe at the outset that the correctness of the ruling or otherwise does not depend upon an application of the principle by which partial payments take an account out of the statute of limitations, concerning which many cases have been cited by the defendant's counsel, but of the statutory rule relating to mutual accounts. The partial-payments principle has reference solely to credits or payments, and regards such a payment as a recognition of the debt and a renewal of the promise to pay. The statutory rule rests upon other grounds.

The defendant particularly cites and relies upon Benjamin v. Webster, 65 Me. 170, but we do not think that case is conclusive as an authority on the point now involved. In that case the debit account was a single item, and the payment relied upon to take the account out of the statute of limitations was made generally on account, and not specifically, as here, to pay a single, separate item. It is true that the court used language which seems to sustain the defendant's contention. But the language related to a condition which did not exist in that case, and it was not necessary to the decision. In fact, the whole tenor of the opinion was based upon the principle of partial payments. And that principle was applicable to that case as was pointed out on page 172 of 65 Me.

But this is a different case. Here the plaintiff's right of action does not depend upon proof of one item of credit within six years. The plaintiff relies upon a debit item within six years of the last preceding item, and within six years of the date of the writ. The item and date are undisputed. If the account stopped with the debit item of November 15, 1902, unquestionably it would not come within the operation of the statute of limitations relating to mutual accounts. That statute reads as follows: "In actions of debt or assumpsit to recover the balance due, where there have been mutual dealings between the parties, the items of which are unsettled, whether kept or proved by one party or both, the cause of action shall be deemed to accrue at the time of the last item proved in such account." Rev. Stat. chap. 83, § 90. The statute begins to run with the last item of the account, and it makes no difference whether it is a debit or a credit item, or which party kept or proved it, or whether it appears in the plaintiff's credits or in the defendant's charges, if only it be an account of the other claims. The court, in this case, said: "The auditor has found that these payments, when made, were credited on the postoffice account, and that the parties afterwards settled that account by making that specific application as credited. From the character of the payments, and the facts as found, we are led to regard those payments as having been made under a specific application on those items, and without any intention of having them enter into a general account, to be the subject of future adjustment; and that such is in fact the finding of the auditor. The payments are, therefore, not to be regarded as credits, or as proper items of entry on book. Their effect is to extinguish those items of account on which they were to apply; so that the items of charge and payments are not to be regarded as subsisting claims; and the account should be considered by the auditor as if those items constituted no part of the account."

In Harris v. Howard, 56 Vt. 605, it was held that the payment of two specific items of debit on an account soon after they were incurred was insufficient to prevent the operation of the statute of limitations upon an earlier debit item.

This was also recognized in Hicks v. Blanchard, 60 Vt. 673, 15 Atl. 401.

In Peck v. New York & L. U. S. Mail S. S. Co. 5 Bosw. 226, it was said that a specific payment directly appropriated to a specific item in an open account leaves the statute to its operation as to the rest.

In Moore v. Blackman, 109 Wis. 528, 85 N. W. 429, a married woman living upon her own farm, but operated for her by her husband, purchased goods of plaintiff upon an open account, which, however, was never settled. Some years thereafter her husband bought seed and wire from the plaintiff, the former of which appeared to be a cash transaction, and the latter, to have been paid for by notes. In an action to recover on the original account, it was claimed by plaintiff that, because the wire and seed purchased by the husband were used on the wife's farm, these transactions might be tacked to the original account and thus avoid the bar of the statute of limitations. It was held, however, that, since the evidence conclusively showed that the seed transaction, no question being raised as to the wire transaction, was one by itself, wholly disconnected with the old account, it could not be tacked to the old account so as to rejuvenate it. And see Perry v. Chesley, 77 Me. 393, sufficiently set out in ROGERS v. DAVIS.

Revival of barred debt by application of general payment, see case note to Anderson v. Nystrom, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1141.

mutual dealings between the parties which have not been settled. It is no longer a question of the recognition of the account and of the renewal of the promise to pay it by making a partial payment on account of it.

It follows, then, that, when the defendant bought the tobacco on November 15th on credit, and the price was charged to him on his account, it had the effect of taking the account out of the operation of the statute for six years longer. It was an item of an unsettled account of mutual dealings between the parties, and it was then the last item.

The defendant, however, contends that the specific payment, on December 15, 1902, of the price of the tobacco, had the effect of taking that item out of the account, destroying the extension of the statute which the purchase had effected, and placed the parties back in statu quo. And, in support of this contention, the defendant relies on Perry v. Chesley, 77 Me. 393, as being conclusive. That case is in some respects similar to the case at bar, but it differs at a vital point. In that case there was one debit item and one credit item within the six years. But it was admitted that the debit item was "paid at the time in cash by the defendant, and a receipt given therefor." And this payment was the credit item. It was therefore a cash, and not a credit, transaction. It was never really a matter of account. The plaintiff, having been paid at the time, had nothing to charge to the defendant. Entering both the charge and the contemporaneous payment did not make them real items of account. In the present case, on the contrary, the tobacco was bought on credit and properly charged as an item of the mutual account. The case of Perry v. Chesley, therefore, does not sustain the defendant's contention.

Nor do we think it can be sustained by any reasonable interpretation of the statute. When the parties by their mutual dealings by some item of debit or credit have extended the time of the operation of the statute upon the balance of the account, we do not think it lies in the power of the debtor then to shorten the time by making specific payment of debit items. The statute was evidently intended to preserve the right of action upon a mutual unsettled account for six years after the last item, no matter how far back the account commenced. Until there has been a period of at least six years during which there are no items, either debit or credit, the account is alive and suable. But this may be of little avail to a creditor if, as is claimed by the defendant here, the latter may at any time pay specifically all the items which have accrued 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

within six years and leave his creditor remediless as to the remainder of the account. The creditor is helpless. The debtor may choose what item he will pay, and the creditor must apply the payment as the debtor directs. If, then, the creditor, relying upon the statute, as he ought to be safe in doing, has forborne to sue until only one item is less than six years old, the debtor, if the present contention is to be sustained, may, against the will of the creditor, pay that item, and escape the payment of all the rest. If he can do so in thirty days after the item is charged, he can, with like effect, do so at any time before six years have elapsed. The time is not material. We do not think this contention can be sustained. The effect would be to rob the statute in great measure of its intended efficacy.

The court below erred in ordering judgment for the defendant. Upon the facts found by the auditor, it should have ordered judgment for the plaintiff.

Exceptions sustained.

Case Note. — Elements of damages recoverable by child for death of mother.

The law presumes substantial damages in favor of children surviving their mother's death; and the pecuniary loss of her services in keeping the home of one of them and assisting the family of the other is recoverable in an action for their benefit. Dukeman v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 237 Ill. 104, 86 N. E. 712.

Education in religion, morals, and virtue, which, owing to the peculiar confidence inspired by the relationship of mother and child, can be imparted to children by the children, the damages occasioned by the deprivation of the expectation of pecuniary advantage which would have resulted by a continuance of the mother's life.

Same — pecuniary benefits.

2. The statute (P. L. 1848 p. 151; Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1188, § 10) does not require the plaintiff to show that the next of kin would probably have received from the deceased contributions of money, or of things purchased with money.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Camden County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the negligent killing of his intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

mother alone, is such a benefit and advantage to the child as is capable of being estimated in money; for the loss of which as the result of a mother's death, surviving children may recover damages. St. Lawrence & O. R. Co. v. Lett, 11 Can. S. C. 422.

A charge to a jury in an action by young children to recover for their mother's death is not objectionable because it allows a consideration of the value to such children of a mother's nurture and care. Eames v. Brattleboro, 54 Vt. 471.

In an action by a husband and his children to recover for the loss of the wife and mother, where the court charged that the jury should find for the plaintiffs such a sum as would reasonably compensate them for all such damages as were the direct result to them by reason of the death, it was error to refuse to charge, in addition, for the defendant, that they should allow nothing as solace, or for grief, for the death of deceased. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Boykin, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 72, 74 S. W. 93.

A complaint showing that a deceased mother was survived by children so young as to be dependent upon her for support, nurture, and education sufficiently shows that they suffered a pecuniary loss by the mother's death, to state a cause of action for such loss; and the special pecuniary loss to two of the children because in poor health is also an element of damages. McKeigue v. Janesville, 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. W. 298.

In an action for the death of a wife and mother, it was held that an instruction which stated that plaintiffs were entitled to recover as damages all pecuniary loss suffered by them from the loss of society, protection, etc., of the deceased was properly given. Green v. Southern California R. Co. (Cal.) 67 Pac. 4.

Damages suffered by way of shock resulting from a mother's death may not be recovered, such damages being too problematical, indirect, and uncertain. Filiatrault v. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Gaskill & Gaskill, for plaintiff in error:

A nonsuit should have been granted, no pecuniary loss to the next of kin having been shown.

May v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 63, 42 Atl. 163; Gottlieb v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 71 N. J. L. 47, 58 Atl. 1088.

Messrs. Lewis Starr, James Gay Gordon, and Allen S. Morgan, for defendant in error:

The next of kin of a married woman may maintain an action for the pecuniary loss which they have sustained by her death.

Gottlieb v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 481, 63 Atl. 339.

The next of kin sustained "pecuniary loss."

Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 472; McIntyre v. New York C. R. Co. 37 N. Y. 295; Consolidated Traction Co. v. Hone, 60 N. J. L. 446, 38 Atl. 759; Paulmier

Canadian P. R. Co. Rap. Jud. Quebec, 18 C. S. 491.

The right of action which a child has for the death of its mother is held, in McCubbin v. Hastings, 27 La. Ann. 713, to be that which is inherited from her, and which is for the suffering which she endured. No recovery may be had by a child for the loss and deprivation of the care, education, assistance, and love of his mother.

A statute which gives a jury the right to award "such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death" allows children to recover for the death of their mother the value of her services rendered to them and the amount expended for her funeral expenses. Petrie v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 29 S. C. 303, 7 S. E. 515.

Where a mother aided in the support and maintenance of her children, and cared for them in sickness; and there was a reasonable expectation that such aid and care would continue,—the loss thereof, in an action by the children to recover for their mother's death, is to be considered an element of damages. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Long (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 114.

The damages recoverable by a daughter for the death of her mother are to be determined by the actual pecuniary injury sustained, and, in assessing the damages received, consideration should be had of all surrounding facts and circumstances to determine what aid the child would, in all probability, have received from the mother in the particular case if she had lived. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Younger, 90 Tex. 387, 38 S. W. 1121.

A child may not recover, in an action for his mother's death, damages resulting from the loss of the social relation between the two, nor for loss of the mother's advice and protection. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Lea, 474.

A son's loss of the society of his mother

v. Erie R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 151; Rafferty v. Erie R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 445, 49 Atl. 456; May v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 63, 42 Atl. 163; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Goodman, 62 Pa. 339; Delaware L. & W. R. Co. v. Jones, 128 Pa. 309, 18 Atl. 330.

Pitney, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought under the so-called "death act" (P. L. 1848, p. 151; Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1188, § 10), and resulted in a verdict and judgment for substantial damages. It appears from the record and bill of exceptions that William L. Carter and Ida M. Carter, his wife, while traveling as passengers upon an electric railway car operated by the defendant company, lost their lives through the derailment of the car. The resulting actions against the company was tried together. The defendant's responsibility was admitted. The deaths occurred on October 28, 1906, when the husband was thirty-six years of age, and the wife two years younger. There was no direct evidence to show whether either survived the other. They left surviving two daughters, one fourteen and the other ten years of age, who, by the terms of the statute (amended act March 31, 1897 [P. L. p. 134]), are the beneficiaries of the resulting actions against the company. The present writ of error brings under review only the judgment in favor of the administrator of Ida M. Carter, the wife.

Motions were made for a nonsuit and for is not an element of recovery in an action by him for her death, his recovery being limited to the pecuniary assistance which he might reasonably have expected to receive from his mother. In determining the question of pecuniary damages the court correctly charged that it was proper to take into consideration the relation of the mother in her life to her son, the way they lived together, her age, her physical and mental condition, the means which she had for her support, the probability as to her future life and condition, of what pecuniary value she would be likely to be to the son, and what he would be likely to do for her, and that the pecuniary damage to him would be the excess of the pecuniary benefit she was to him over what he had to do for her. Lazelle v. Newfane, 70 Vt. 440, 41 Atl. 511.

It is said in Chicago & W. J. R. Co. v. Ptacek, 62 Ill. App. 375, in upholding the amount of a verdict in an action for the benefit of children surviving their mother's death, that the question was one solely of pecuniary loss, and, although damages for the bereavement, for pain and suffering, were not recoverable, it was proper to refuse to direct a verdict for nominal damages only.

Where a deceased mother earned money and extended pecuniary assistance to her adult daughters, the cutting off of such assistance by the mother's death was an element to be considered in the assessment of damages, if there was a reasonable expectation of its continuance had she survived. Omaha Water Co. v. Schamel, 78 C. C. A. 68, 147 Fed. 502.

In Countryman v. Fonda, J. & G. R. Co. 166 N. Y. 201, 82 Am. St. Rep. 640, 59 N. E. 822, it was said that the jury, in addition to the question of the actual money damages as proved, were to consider in a reasonable way those prospective and indefinite damages arising from the death of a mother, as, for instance, whether the mother might not take her adult son and daughter home, in case of their failing health, to nurse and care for them indefinitely.

McIntyre v. New York C. R. Co. 47 Barb. 515, was an action for the death of a woman, brought for the benefit of the next of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) kin, her three children. The court, in reducing the amount of the verdict recovered, said: "There is no legitimate element of damages in the case, other than the pecuniary loss to her next of kin resulting from her death. They doubtless suffered mental anguish from her sudden and violent death, and it would be natural that their hearts were made to bleed over the mournful circumstances attending it. But none of these were pecuniary injuries for which the law affords a pecuniary compensation."

The damages recoverable by children for the death of their mother are limited to those of a pecuniary character; but such damages are not confined to the immediate loss of money or property. The recovery should look to the loss of prospective pecuniary advantages, such as nurture, intellectual, moral, and physical training, and such instruction as can proceed only from a mother. Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 471, S. C. 29 N. Y. 252, 86 Am. Dec. 297. This holding was followed in McIntyre v. New York C. R. Co. 37 N. Y. 287, affirming 47 Barb. 515.

But the value of the intellectual and moral training a mother might have given her children is not considered a proper element of damages in Bradley v. Ohio River & C. R. Co. 122 N. C. 972, 30 S. E. 8, where the measure of damages is held to be the pecuniary injury to the children in the loss of the value of the mother's labor or the amount of her earnings if she had lived.

In an action by a husband and his children to recover for the death of the wife and mother, the children may recover for their own peculiar loss in being deprived of their mother's services; and an instruction to the effect that children may recover the value of the mother's nurture and instruction, moral and physical, together with intellectual training, is not erroneous. Johnson v. Southern P. R. Co. (Cal.) 97 Pac. 520; Redfield v. Oakland Consol. Street R. Co. 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822, 1063.

The loss of financial aid from the income of property owned by a deceased mother is an element of damages in an action by her children to recover for her death, where such the direction of a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that there was nothing to show any pecuniary loss to the next of kin as a result of Mrs. Carter's death. We think these motions were properly overruled. There was evidence to show that the children lived with their parents in the city of Camden, in a home maintained with the earnings of the father, and that the wife performed the household duties, except that a woman was occasionally employed to do washing and cleaning. It was reasonably to be inferred that she took such care of her children as a mother usually takes. The statute provides that the jury may give such damages as they shall deem fair and just, with reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death to the next of kin. As was long ago pointed out by Chief Justice Beasley, this means "a deprivation of a reasonable expectation of a pecuniary advantage which would have resulted by a continuance of the life of the deceased." Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 151, 158. This definition has been consistently adhered to in subsequent cases. Denarest v. Little, 47 N. J. L. 28; Consolidated Traction Co. v. Hone, 60 N. J. L. 444, 446, 38 Atl. 759; Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. 63 N. J. L. 558, 567, 44 Atl. 633. Under circumstances such as are here presented, we think there is a reasonable inference that the continuance of the mother's life would have resulted in substantial pecuniary benefit to the children. The statute does not require the plaintiff to show that the income was the result of the mother's business activity. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Long, supra.

Phalen v. Rochester R. Co. 31 App. Div. 448, 52 N. Y. Supp. 836, in affirming a verdict claimed to be excessive, said, in regard to children's rights to recover such a sum as the jury deemed "to be a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injuries" resulting from the death of their mother: "In the case at bar the mother, having reared her children and seen them settled in life, was spending her declining years living around among them, some of her children affording her pecuniary assistance to make her life comfortable. The fact that they had dutifully done so does not detract from their right to recover damages in this action. It might well be that, when sickness or misfortune should render the care or assistance of this mother necessary, she would be in a condition to render it, and this would certainly be a pecuniary benefit. But we will not indulge in anticipations of the many ways in which the jury might see how the deceased could render pecuniary aid to her sons and daughters. They had the right to that aid, and to the preservation of her life as long as Providence should permit."

In Tuteur v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Wis. 505, 46 N. W. 897, children were allowed to recover for their mother's death the actual pecuniary loss sustained, taking into consideration the number of years the mother would probably have lived, the reasonable expectation of her property increasing, and the reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit to the children by way of support or otherwise had the deceased lived.

Where there was evidence from which a jury could find a reasonable expectation of pecuniary advantage from the continued life of the mother of children suing for her death, they might assess as damages the actual money loss to the children. In estimating such a loss occasional gifts and services should not be taken into consideration; but, where there was a persistent regularity in such contributions from year to year, so unvarying as to justify a reasonable expectation of continuance, and contributing appreciably to the comfort and health of her 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

children, the loss to them is a pecuniary one for which they are entitled to compensation. Schnatz v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 160 Pa. 602, 28 Atl. 952.

A statute allowing such damages to be given as, "under all the circumstances of the case, may be just," does not warrant awarding a recovery for the grief of a son caused by his mother's death; but, in estimating the damages suffered, the jury should take into consideration the loss of the home afforded by his mother, and a prospective college education which she was able to give him. Butte Electric R. Co. v. Jones, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1205, 164 Fed. 308.

In Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Venable, 67 Ga. 697, the court, in determining from what date to allow damages to a child for its mother's death, made the statement that the measure of damages was the deprivation of the child of her mother's support.

The loss of a mother's care, nurture, training, and instruction is an element to be considered in determining the pecuniary injury to a child of tender years, suffered as a result of its mother's death. Omaha Water Co. v. Schamel, 78 C. C. A. 68, 147 Fed. 502.

The pecuniary benefit resulting to a child from services rendered by her mother, who lived with her and attended to the household, may be recovered as an element of damages in an action for the mother's death; but for occasional assistance rendered to other children in case of sickness, of the value of which there is no evidence, there may be no recovery. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 63 Md. 135.

The expectancy of children in the fruits of their mother's earnings in her business is not to be taken into consideration in estimating the damages suffered by the children upon their mother's death, where it is conceded that her earnings, immediately upon being realized, became her husband's property. Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. supra.

Attention is called to the note to Butte Electric R. Co. v. Jones, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1205, on the question of a minor's right to damages for the negligent killing of his parent, as limited to the period of minority.

In Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 471, 475, Denio, J., said: "The injury to the children of the deceased by the death of their mother was a legitimate ground of damages; and we do not agree with the defendants' counsel that they ought to have been nominal. The difficulty upon this point arises from the employment of the word 'pecuniary' in the statute; but it was not used in a sense so limited as to confine it to the immediate loss of money or property, for, if that were so, there is scarcely a case where any amount of damages could be recovered. It looks to prospective advantages of a pecuniary nature, which have been cut off by the premature death of the person from whom they would have proceeded; and the word 'pecuniary' was used in distinction to those injuries to the affections and sentiments which arise from the death of relatives, and which, though most painful and grievous to be borne, cannot be measured or recompensed by money. It excludes, also, those losses which result from the deprivation of the society and companionship of relatives, which are equally incapable of being defined by any recognized measure of value. But infant children sustain a loss from the death of their parents, and especially of their mother, of a different kind. She owes them the duty of nurture, and of intellectual, moral, and physical training, and of such instruction as can only proceed from a mother.

. . . It is argued by the defendants' counsel that there should be no recovery on these grounds, because the father is obliged to provide what the children have been deprived of by the loss of their mother. But this is not an adequate answer. The children have been deprived of that which they were entitled to receive by the wrongful act of the defendants. Their loss may or may not be made up to them from another source; but in the meantime they are entitled to a fair and just compensation from the wrongdoers by the provisions of this statute." And see S. C. 29 N. Y. 252, 285, 86 Am. Dec. 297. In Gottlieb v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 480, 63 Atl. 339, this court decided that, under the statute, an action may be maintained by the administrator of a deceased wife for the benefit of her next of kin, notwithstanding the husband be still living. In that case the husband was himself administrator.

In the present case it is argued that the services rendered by Mrs. Carter to her children were rendered in performance of the duty that she owed to her husband, and the suggestion is that the children's expectation of benefit in this behalf was, or ought to have been, included in the action brought by the administrator of their father. The record before us does not disclose what was the outcome of the latter action; nor, in our opinion, are we concerned with it. Each parent owes duties to the children, independent of the marital duties they owe to each other. The presumption is that the death of both parents is more detrimental to dependent children, from the pecuniary standpoint, than the death of a single parent only. What damages ought to be allowed for the death of either is to be regulated by instructions to the jury. May v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 63, 42 Atl. 163, is cited as sustaining the proposition that, pending the husband's life, the wife's services in the household are due to him, and are only incidentally beneficial to the children; and that the prospect that the wife would have survived the husband, whereupon her services would become a direct pecuniary benefit to the children, is too remote to be considered in fixing the pecuniary benefit of which the children are deprived by the mother's premature death. In the case referred to the only question for determination was whether the damages were excessive. The decision is not authoritative upon the question of the right of recovery, and in the discussion of that question the expressions in the opinion are not to be accepted without modification. Moreover, if we were to treat the mother's care of young children as bestowed, during the father's lifetime, in performance of a duty owing to him rather than to them, the assumption would have little, if any, bearing upon the present case. For here the father's life had already terminated before the issue was tried, and so his expectancy of life was no longer in the realm of speculation. Not only so, but his death was caused by the same act of the defendant that terminated the mother's life. There was no error in the refusal of the motions for nonsuit and for direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant.

The only other ground relied upon for reversal is the instruction of the trial judge to the jury respecting the damages to be allowed in the event of a verdict for the plaintiff. Taking the whole of the charge together, we think it not open to reasonable criticism upon this point.

The judgment under review should be affirmed.

Garrison, J., dissenting:

The beneficiaries in whose interest this judgment was recovered are the children of William L. and Ida M. Carter, both of whom were killed in the same railway accident.

The resulting actions against the company, in the cases of both the father and the mother of the beneficiaries, which, as stated in the opinion, were brought by the same administrator in the same court, were tried together, and submitted to the jury in a single charge, in which the rule for the admeasurement of damages in each case was laid down. In the father's case the jury was instructed that, in awarding the damages which were to be only of a pecuniary nature, they should take into consideration "the loss by these children of the maintenance and support of their father, the comforts and conveniences of home, the education of these children, and the provision at his death from the accumulated savings of his income."

In the case of the mother, which is the one before us on this writ of error, the jury was instructed: "As to the other suit, the suit brought by the administrator of the mother, Ida Carter, you may award such sum as you think these children have lost by being deprived of her services, care, and attention which, had she lived, she would have given to them, and which now must be procured by them in some other way."

This instruction, which was specifically excepted to, is, in my opinion, an erroneous one that permitted, if it did not necessitate, a reduplication of damages. The concrete vice of the instruction is that, if it is limited to damages of a pecuniary nature, it covers the same ground as the instruction given in the case of the father. If it is not so limited, it is on that account, erroneous. Assuming that in each case the damages were only such as were of a pecuniary nature, the "services, care, and attention" of a mother, which the jury were told to give in one case, are nominally directed chiefly, if not wholly, to securing and promoting the "comforts and conveniences of home and the education of the children," which the jury had been told to award in the father's case; so that, if the jury obeyed both instructions, as we must presume they did, they necessarily awarded in the case of the mother damages which, in so far as they were of a pecuniary nature, they also rewarded to the case of the father, and which, if not of a pecuniary nature, should not have been permitted in either case.

This result inevitably inheres in the instructions that were given to the jury, and does not depend upon any speculations as to matters aliunde respecting survivorship.

For this judgment in the case of the mother of the beneficiaries must stand either upon the theory that the father was living at the time of her death, or that he was not. If the former, then, under the instruction of the court, the children were awarded damages which, in so far as they were susceptible of pecuniary assessment, they had not sustained. If the latter, they were awarded damages which, in so far as they were capable of pecuniary admeasurement, they recovered in the action for the father's death. Whichever theory be adopted, a verdict rendered in accordance with the instruction under review would be founded upon an erroneous rule of damages.

In my opinion the judgment should therefore be reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

VERYL PRESTON, Respt.,

v.

ÆTNA INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(193 N. Y. 142, 85 N. E. 1006.)

Insurance — automobile — explosion — liability.

A fire burning an automobile originates within the vehicle, within the meaning of an exception of fires so originating in a policy of insurance on it, where, in consequence of the machine's running into a ditch, gasoline leaks from the tank, and the vapor penetrates the lamp forming the headlight and explodes, causing the fire.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment entered in the office of the clerk of New York County on the report of a referee dismissing a complaint filed to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire-insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edgar J. Nathan, for appellant:

The lamps attached to the dashboard were a part of the automobile.

The fire originated within the vehicle.

Nelson v. Traders' Ins. Co. 181 N. Y. 472, 74 N. E. 421; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d

Note. — The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the question of the applicability of a provision in a policy insuring an automobile, exempting the insurer from payment of loss caused by fire "originating within the vehicle," as an extensive search has failed to disclose any other case in which such provision was presented to the court for construction.

Messrs. Philip G. Bartlett and Graham Sumner, for respondent:

The fire which caused the plaintiff's loss was not a fire originating within the vehicle, within the meaning of the policy of insurance.

Schoonmaker v. Hoyt, 148 N. Y. 425, 42 N. E. 1059; Dady v. O'Rourke, 172 N. Y. 447, 65 N. E. 273; Hustace v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 175 N. Y. 292, 62 L.R.A. 651, 67 N. E. 592.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought on a fire-insurance policy to recover for the damage caused to an automobile by fire. The policy contained this provision: "It is understood and agreed that this policy does not cover loss or damage caused by fire originating within the vehicle." On a dark night in July, 1902, the automobile insured, which was propelled by the explosion of gasoline vapor, while going from Pleasure Bay to Monmouth, New Jersey, ran off the road into a ditch filled with water to the depth of a man's knee. At the time of the occurrence there were in the vehicle a chauffeur and three other men. The automobile lay at an angle of 40 degrees with the bed of the road. Finding it impossible to extricate the machine from the ditch, the three men left for assistance, and almost immediately after heard the noise of an explosion, when, running to the place of the accident, they found the automobile in flames and the chauffeur lying on the ground across the ditch, with his clothes torn and his arms and hands bare. The chauffeur died before the trial of this action, so the origin of the fire can be determined only from the circumstances narrated by the other persons. At the time of the accident two kerosene lamps on the dashboard of the vehicle were lighted. It is assumed by both parties that, on account of the slanting position in which the vehicle stood, the gasoline ran out of the tank, covered the surface of the water, and its vapor coming in contact with the lighted lamps took fire and caused the explosion. This theory is in harmony with the statements made in plaintiff's proof of loss, to wit, "said fire originating as follows: On road from Pleasure Bay to Monmouth Beach. Caused by extinguishing lamp." The referee found as a fact that the loss and damage originated within the vehicle, and awarded judgment to the defendant. This judgment was reversed by the appellate division, the order of which is silent as to the grounds of the reversal. It is therefore presumed to have 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been on the law alone (Code of Civil Procedure, § 1338), the facts found by the referee not being disturbed, provided there was any evidence to support them. Therefore the question before this court is whether a fire occurring in the manner described falls within the exception of the policy as a "fire originating within the vehicle."

We cannot accept the view entertained by the majority of the appellate division. Doubtless the general rule is, as often stated, that, where an insurance policy is so drawn as to be ambiguous or require interpretation, that interpretation will be adopted which is most favorable to the insured. Rickerson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 307, 43 N. E. 856; Michael v. Prussian Nat. Ins. Co. 171 N. Y. 25, 63 N. E. 810. But the rule is equally well settled that contracts of insurance, like other contracts, are to be construed according to the sense and meaning of the terms which the parties have used, and, if they are clear and unambiguous, the terms are to be taken and understood in their plain, ordinary, and proper sense. Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379; Nelson v. Traders' Ins. Co. 181 N. Y. 472, 74 N. E. 421. That the lamps were part of the automobile so that the policy would have covered their loss had the fire been caused by other than the excepted risk seems reasonably clear. That the gasoline vapor must have penetrated within the lamp to have ignited is also clear. Therefore, within the letter of the policy, the fire in this case originated within the vehicle itself, and was an excepted risk. We do not care, however, to stand on the proposition that, construing the policy literally, this fire fell within the exceptions, but on the broader ground that, by a fair interpretation of the policy, it was intended to exclude risks of this character. The motive power used in the automobile, volatile, and inflammable in the highest degree, was a constant source of danger by fire. Fire might happen from many circumstances, some of which it was possible to foresee, others which it was not possible to foresee. It might be caused from some defect in the electric apparatus or in the valves controlling the flow from the tank into the motor, setting fire to the whole store of gasoline. If the vehicle was run at a high speed, the machinery might become so heated as to cause fire; and, as already suggested, the fire might be caused in many other ways which could not be anticipated. The fair and natural import of the policy was to exclude loss by fire, danger of which was inherent in the use or operation of the automobile itself without the intervention of any extrinsic cause or agency. If an incendiary, desiring to destroy the automobile, should throw a lighted match into the tank, the fire would, under a literal reading of the policy and under the position assumed by the respondent's counsel, originate "within the vehicle;" but, in our judgment, such a loss would not fall within the spirit or fair interpretation of the exception, but, on the contrary, be covered by the policy. In such a case it would be the independent act of a third party that caused the fire. It is true that, by reason of the presence of the gasoline, an automobile would possibly at all times be more inflammable and subject to greater injury by fire than other vehicles. Such risk was doubtless paid for by the premium exacted and was covered by the policy. What the policy intended to except was fire developed by or originating in the use of the automobile as distinguished from fire occasioned by external causes. In other words, "within" in this policy is used as the antithesis of "extrinsic" or "without," not as the synonym of "interior." The question is one that does not admit of extended elaboration. We can only say that, in our judgment, the policy did not cover the loss in this case.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the judgment entered upon the report of the referee affirmed, with costs in both courts.

Vann, J., dissenting:

The decision of this appeal turns on the meaning of the words "fire originating within the vehicle," which form part of an exception that is claimed to release the defendant from the obligation of its general promise to insure "against all direct loss or damage by fire." The exception from the promise is not a part of the printed policy, but was written in and is peculiarly the language of the insurer. If the meaning of the exception is in doubt, the law holds the company responsible "because it prepared and executed the contract, and the language used is wholly its own." Rickerson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 307, 313, 43 N. E. 856. The learned appellate division gave the words in question one meaning, while the referee and one of the justices below gave them another. We also differ with no uncertain divergence of views as to what they mean; and can it be said under these circumstances, with propriety or truth, that the meaning of the company is expressed so clearly as to exempt it from the application of the rule that the author of a serious doubt in a written instrument must bear the burden thereof?

was the direct cause thereof? The gasoline was a mere potentiality, the same as a bundle of pine shavings or a can of gunpowder might have been. It did not cause the fire, for there is no claim of spontaneous combustion. It was highly inflammable, but it was not the first material that caught fire. The fire did not originate in the gasoline. It originated in an explosive vapor that came partly, but not wholly, from the gasoline, owing to rapid evaporation after it had escaped from the vehicle. The gasoline in the form of a liquid oil flowed out of the inverted tank on the ground or water beneath. It was then no longer within, but wholly without, the vehicle, and it was not then on fire. Contact with the air and combination therewith at once turned it into a vapor or gas; that is, "a compound or mixture capable of a rapid chemical reaction," known as an "explosion." It was not until after the gasoline was resting on the surface of the earth, wholly free from the vehicle, that the gas came into existence. As a gas it was never inside of the vehicle. It was a new substance, composed of gasoline and air. It was created by the action of the outside air upon the gasoline after it was also outside. That action took place without the vehicle and the product of evaporation sprang into existence without the vehicle. It was never within the vehicle, for it was not composed wholly of gasoline. A new element was added to the gasoline after its escape, and the oil and air compounded, not simply combined, was a new substance. This new substance thus brought into existence without the vehicle caught fire doubtless from contact with the flame of a kerosene lamp. Assuming that the lamp was part of the vehicle, that which first took fire was not a part of it, nor within it. The gas, floating in the air wholly outside of the vehicle, first caught fire, and that fire was communicated to the vehicle and destroyed it. The fire me jure did not originate within the vehicle, any more than if the vehicle had run into a hay stack, the lamp had set fire to the hay, and the burning hay had set the vehicle on fire or, to use another illustration, if the vehicle had overturned a storage tank and the gas arising from the oil as it flowed on the ground had been ignited by the lamp, and fire had thus been communicated to the vehicle itself.

The purpose of the exception from general liability imposed on the defendant by the policy, as I gather the meaning from the words used, was to exempt the insurer when the fire was caused by the operation of the machinery, or by defects in the vehicle itself, or by inherent agencies which were a part of the machine and operated wholly within it, with no aid from external causes.

Such a fire would owe its origin wholly to internal conditions, and hence could properly be said to have "originated within the vehicle." The fire in question originated without the vehicle, for it was kindled outside and was burning outside before the vehicle itself caught fire.

I vote for affirmance and judgment absolute against the appellant on its stipulation.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

HADDOCK, BLANCHARD, & COMPANY, Incorporated, Resp't.,
v.

JOHN C. HADDOCK, Appt.

(192 N. Y. 499, 85 N. E. 682.)

Bills and notes — negotiable instruments act.

1. A complaint upon a bill or note, which does not allege a collateral agreement between the parties whose names are on the instrument, but which seeks to recover against a person otherwise than as provided by the negotiable instruments act, states no cause of action.

Bill of exchange — irregular indorsement — parol evidence.

2. Parol evidence is admissible in an action by the drawer of a bill of exchange payable to his own order, against a stranger who placed his name on the back of the instrument before delivery, and above which the drawer's indorsement was placed, to show that he intended to become surety for the acceptor, and assume liability to the drawer,

Case Note. — Admissibility of parol evidence to vary the liability of an irregular party to a bill or note from that declared by the negotiable instruments act.

Under the law as it existed prior to the adoption by the several states of the so-called uniform negotiable instruments act, there existed two doctrines in regard to the admissibility of parol evidence to show the true relation of an irregular indorser of a bill or note to the transaction. One doctrine was that parol evidence was admissible to show the true relationship of the parties, and, inasmuch as an irregular indorser was not a party to the contract, the admission of such evidence was not contrary to the doctrine that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract. The other doctrine held that such evidence would vary the terms of a written contract, and was therefore inadmissible.

The purpose of this note is to show the effect upon this question of the negotiable instruments act. The cases are not at all notwithstanding the negotiable instruments law provides that, if the instrument is payable to the order of the drawer, a person not otherwise a party to the instrument, who places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, is liable to all persons subsequent to the drawer, since, the drawer being in legal effect an indorser, the parties are within the provisions of the section of the statute which declares that, as between indorsers, parol evidence is admissible to show the order in which they agreed to be liable.

(September 29, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term for Broome County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of an indorser of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. Edward Kelley, for appellant:

Before the negotiable instruments law, the contracts created between the parties to negotiable paper were contracts in writing, and parol evidence was not admissible to vary, alter, or contradict their terms, which were deemed to be fully expressed on the face of the instrument.

Byles, Bills, 16th ed. p. 114; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 707a, 707b, 717; Norton, Bills & Notes, §§ 67, 68; Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30, 26 L. ed. 647; Hall v. Newcomb, 7 Hill, 416, 42 Am. numerous, and are not harmonious. Several cases sustain the principle enunciated in HADDOCK, B. & Co. v. HADDOCK, that parol evidence is admissible to show the true character of the transaction and the relationship and liability of the irregular party.

Thus, in Kohn v. Consolidated Butter & Egg Co. 30 Misc. 725, 63 N. Y. Supp. 265, the court, after discussing the provisions in the negotiable instruments act in regard to irregular indorsers, said: "The true intention of indorsers as between themselves can always be shown by oral evidence. . . . To go further and decide that the statute intended to create an incontestable liability against irregular indorsers would be to impute to the legislative wisdom a design repugnant to every notion of judicial procedure, especially in a provision enacted in the interest of law reform."

So, in Morgan v. Thompson, 72 N. J. L. 244, 62 Atl. 410, it was held that parol evidence is admissible to show the true relation of the maker of the note to the transaction. The court said: "Since the passage

M. & R. 703; Moseley v. Hanford, 10 Barn. & C. 729; New London Credit Syndicate v. Neale [1898] 2 Q. B. 487.

An exception to this rule has arisen in this country, in the case of irregular indorsements of instruments payable to the order of a person other than the maker or drawer, and the indorser might, accordingly, be held liable to the payee of such paper by the aid of parol evidence.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 709, 711; Norton, Bills & Notes, § 68; Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. L. 517, 10 Am. Rep. 256; Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn. 213, 29 Am. Dec. 282; Bigelow v. Colton, 13 Gray, 309, 74 Am. Dec. 633; Rey v. Simpson, 22 How. 341, 16 L. ed. 260; Barrows v. Lane, 5 Vt. 161, 26 Am. Rep. 293; Kingsland v. Koeppe, 137 Ill. 344, 13 L.R.A. 649, 28 N. Y. 72, 10 Am. Rep. 433; Moore v. Cross, 19 N. Y. 229, 75 Am. Dec. 326; Hall v. Newcomb and Spies v. Gilmore, supra.

But the exception had never, prior to the statute, been extended to irregular indorsements of instruments drawn payable to the order of the maker or drawer; and the indorser, therefore, could not be held liable to the payee of such paper.

of the negotiable instruments act evidence is admissible, even between indorsers, to show that, as between themselves, they have agreed as to the liability otherwise than appears from the order of their indorsement upon the note. The note is only prima facie evidence of the order of liability."

And in Wilson v. Hendee, 74 N. J. L. 640, 66 Atl. 413, it was held that the act admitted of the introduction of parol evidence to show the actual agreement made between several indorsers, notwithstanding the fact that it contradicted the prima facie inference appearing from their successive indorsements.

But, to the contrary was the decision in Baumeister v. Kuntz, 53 Fla. 430, 42 So. 886. In this case the court said that, prior to the enactment of the negotiable instruments law it had been held that, when a party who was neither the maker nor the payee of a promissory note, for the purpose of enabling the maker to raise money on it and before the note passed to the payee, had indorsed the note in blank, he became liable as one of the makers of the note. 19 L.R.A. The negotiable instruments law renders irregular indorsers of paper drawn payable to the order of the maker or drawer liable only to parties subsequent to the payee, in accordance with the prior law.

But, by the terms of the statute, when a person not otherwise a party to a negotiable instrument places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, his status is fixed as that of an indorser; and, where the statute fixes the status of a party to a negotiable instrument as being that of an indorser, parol evidence is not admissible to vary such status.

In Kinsel v. Wieland, 38 Colo. 296, 88 Pac. 153, it was held that parol proof was admissible to show the circumstances in which persons other than the payee, and apparently not connected with the promissory note, had indorsed the same. It does not appear, however, that this decision was affected in any way by the negotiable instruments act, although such a statute had been enacted in that state.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a foreign corporation authorized to do business in this state, and engaged as a wholesale dealer in coal at Binghamton. The Plymouth Coal Company, a corporation, was engaged in the operation of coal mines in Pennsylvania prior to March, 1902, at which time it went into the hands of a receiver. The defendant was the president and manager of said coal company, and the owner of substantially all of its stock. The defendant was, until May, 1902, the president of the plaintiff, and during all the times herein mentioned had charge of plaintiff's New York office. At the time when the note and bills hereinafter mentioned were given, the plaintiff was engaged in selling on commission at wholesale the coal mined by the Plymouth company or its receiver, under a contract made with said coal company. One B, the vice president of the plaintiff prior to May, 1902, and its president thereafter, passed upon the financial responsibility of persons seeking credit with the plaintiff, and he arranged with a trust company at Binghamton to discount commercial paper of the plaintiff's customers. The Lenape Coal Company, the Living Stone Coal Company, and the Montauk Coal Company were severally organized as corporations and engaged in the business of retailing coal in or near the city of New York, and the defendant was the owner of substantially all of the stock of each. Soon after the organization of such corporations to retail coal, they sought credit with the plaintiff, and their financial responsibility was investigated by B. The responsibility of each was found to be unsatisfactory, and B. so reported to the defendant, and the defendant replied that said companies were his companies and he would guarantee their credit by indorsing their paper.

On February 13, 1902, said Lenape Coal Company, for value received, executed and delivered to the plaintiff, as payee, its certain promissory note for $880.96, dated on that day, payable four months after date at a bank in the city of New York. On and between January 27, 1902, and May 13, 1902, the plaintiff, for value received, made thirty several drafts each on either said Lenape Coal Company, said Living Stone Coal Company, or said Montauk Coal Company, payable to the order of itself as payee which drafts aggregated $26,833.15, each of which drafts was, for value received, accepted by the coal company on which it was drawn, payable at a place and on a day in each respectively specified. The drafts or bills were all similar in form, and the following is a copy of one of said bills:

Coal Office of Haddock, Blanchard, & Co., Incorporated.

New York, April 28, 1902.

Four months after date pay to the order of ourselves thirteen hundred twenty-seven and 41/100 dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of Haddock, Blanchard, & Co., Incorporated.

C. N. Blanchard, Asst. Treas.

To Montauk Co., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Indorsed across the face:

Accepted. Payable at the Binghamton Trust Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

The Montauk Coal Co.,

Chas. B. Smith, Treas.

Indorsed on the back:

Haddock, Blanchard, & Co., Incorporated.

C. N. Blanchard, Assistant Treasurer,

John C. Haddock.

Said note, after it had been signed by said Lenape Coal Company, and each of said bills, after they had been accepted by the corporation on which they were severally drawn, were indorsed by the defendant before delivery; and thereafter each of them, so indorsed, was, before maturity, delivered to the plaintiff as payee, and the plaintiff thereafter and prior to their maturity severally indorsed and procured them to be discounted at a trust company at Binghamton. Said note and each of said bills were given and delivered to the plaintiff for the purchase price of coal sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the acceptors, respectively, of said bills and the maker of said note, or in renewal in whole or in part of prior notes or bills given or accepted for the purchase price of coal so sold and delivered. Said note and each of said bills were so indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of the maker of said note and the acceptor of said bills, respectively, and for the purpose of giving such maker and acceptors credit with the plaintiff, and in pursuance of an agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff by which the plaintiff agreed to sell coal on credit to the acceptors of said bills, and to the maker of said note upon the defendant's guaranteeing the credit of said companies respectively; and the plaintiff was induced to take said accepted bills and said note, and each of them, for such coal by reason of the indorsement of the said defendant and pursuant to said agreement that the defendant would be liable thereon to the plaintiff in case the respective corporations primarily liable thereon should make default in payment thereof. The proceeds of said bills and note were remitted to the defendant at the New York office of the plaintiff to provide funds to pay for coal and other current expenses. At the time when said note and bills respectively became due they were presented for payment at the place where they were respectively made payable, and payment duly demanded, which was refused, and thereupon each was duly protested for nonpayment, and notice thereof given to the plaintiff and to said defendant. Thereafter the plaintiff was compelled to take up said note and drafts and pay the amount due thereon, respectively, and became the owner and holder thereof and of each of them.

This action is brought to compel the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the amount of said note and bills pursuant to his said agreement with the plaintiff when they were severally indorsed by him; and the facts upon which the plaintiff's claim is based are stated in the complaint. The defendant denies that he indorsed the note and bills for the accommodation of and as surety for the retail coal companies, respectively; but the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court from which the statements of fact in this opinion have been taken. As the facts are found, if the intention of the parties is to prevail, the defendant should be required to pay to the plaintiff the amount of such note and bills as established by the judgment. The defendant contends that the position of his name upon the note and bills conclusively establishes that he indorsed the several instruments without liability to the plaintiff, and that parol evidence should not have been received to affect or overcome the alleged conclusive presumption arising from his indorsements as made.

In the early decisions by the courts in this state there was some confusion relating to the liability of a person who indorsed a note or bill prior to its delivery. Labron v. Woram, 1 Hill, 91; Herrick v. Carman, 12 Johns. 159; Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233, S. C. 7 Hill, 416, 42 Am. Dec. 82; Hahn v. Hull, 2 Abb. Pr. 352. This court, in Moore v. Cross, 19 N. Y. 227, 75 Am. Dec. 326, referring to a case of a person who, for the accommodation of a maker, indorsed a note payable to a third person, says: "Some confusion has been thrown around this subject from what has been finally settled to have been an error, treating such an indorsement as a guaranty and charging the indorser as a maker or guarantor. This doctrine was advanced in Herrick v. Caraman, 12 Johns. 160, and was adjudged in Nelson v. Dubois, 13 Johns. 175, and Campbell v. Butler, 14 Johns. 349. It was attacked in Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend. 214, and in Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill, 80, and was finally overthrown in Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233, and the same case in error, 7 Hill, 416, 42 Am. Dec. 82. The chancellor, in his opinion in the latter case, says: "If the object of the second indorser was to enable the drawer to obtain money from the payee of the note upon the credit of the accommodation indorser, he may indorse it without recourse, and, by such indorsement, may either make it payable to the second indorser or to the bearer; and such original payee may then, as legal holder and owner of the note, recover thereon against such second indorser, upon a declaration stating such special indorsement by him and subsequent indorsement of the note to him by the second indorser." The court further says: "If a note be made and indorsed for the accommodation of A, who indorses it to another person, and afterward in the course of trade again becomes the holder, he could maintain no action against the maker and indorser for his accommodation, notwithstanding their apparent liability to him on the face of the paper. The fact of the accommodation making and indorsing might be proved to defeat the action, and it would establish that the agreement of the parties, contrary to the legal inference from the face of the paper, did not impose a liability on the maker and indorser to pay the party suing."

There has always been conflict among the courts of the several states both in asserting the principles upon which irregular indorsers upon commercial paper are to be held and in the conclusion arrived at in particular cases litigated. The number of cases is so great, and the possibility of even a partial reconciliation of them so remote, that we will confine our citation of authorities wholly to those in this state. It was well settled in this state for many years prior to the enactment of the negotiable instruments law that a person who puts his name on the back of a bill or note before its delivery is presumably a second indorser and not liable to the payee; but the presumption could be rebutted by parol evidence to show that the intention of the indorser was to become surety for some prior party to the instrument. *Moore v. The negotiable instruments law was first enacted in this state in 1897. Laws 1897, chap. 612, p. 734. Section 113 of the said law provides: "A person placing his signature upon an instrument otherwise than as maker, drawer, or acceptor is deemed to be an indorser, unless he clearly indicates by appropriate words his intention to be bound in some other capacity." The defendant was, within this definition, an indorser of each of said instruments. Section 114 of the said law provides: "Where a person, not otherwise a party to an instrument, places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, he is liable as indorser in accordance with the following rules: (1) If the instrument is payable to the order of a third person, he is liable to the payee and to all subsequent parties. (2) If the instrument is payable to the order of the maker or drawer, or is payable to bearer, he is liable to all parties subsequent to the maker or drawer. (3) If he signs for the accommodation of the payee, he is liable to all parties subsequent to the payee." By this section of said law, the presumption as established by the courts in this state was changed, and an irregular indorser is now presumed to be liable in accordance with the express language of the statute. Questions relating to the sufficiency of the pleadings are settled by the statute. A complaint upon a note or bill, without alleging a collateral agreement between the parties whose names are on the instrument, seeking to recover against a person except as provided by the statute, would clearly be demurrable.

The note of the Lenape Coal Company was payable to the plaintiff, a third person, and the defendant, according to the provisions of said § 114, is liable to the plaintiff, the payee therein. No serious contention has been made to the contrary. The serious question for consideration arises from the fact that the bills were payable to the maker and drawer thereof, respectively, and the defendant, as an indorser thereon before delivery, is not, under the statute, prima facie liable thereon to the plaintiff. Should parol evidence have been allowed to show the intent of the parties? We have not discovered any exception to the rule as established by the courts of this state, allowing parol evidence as between the parties whose names appear on the bill or note to determine their liability as between themselves. It is frequently stated that, where a note is payable to a person other than the maker, and is indorsed by a third person before delivery, the intention of the indorser is ambiguous and uncertain on the face of the paper; and such uncertainty justifies the receipt of parol evidence to determine the true intention of the parties. We do not see that any greater certainty exists upon the face of a bill as to the true intention of the parties, where it is drawn to bearer or to the order of the maker, and it is indorsed by a third person after acceptance by the acceptor and before delivery to the payee and maker. There is a certain rule of presumption determined by common law or by statute, but the alleged reason for the rule in either case is not very apparent. The long-established rule to allow parol evidence, that the intention of the parties may prevail, seems to have met with somewhat general approval, without discussing specifically the principles upon which such evidence is admitted.

It is said by Daniel in his work on Negotiable Instruments, 5th ed. § 710: "Whatever diversities of interpretation may be found in the authorities on the subject, they very generally concur, though not with entire unanimity, that, as between the immediate parties, the interpretation ought to be in every case such as will carry their intention into effect; and that their intention may be made out by parol proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction." Story, Promissory Notes, § 479. In Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 341, the court says: "Considerable diversity of decision, it must be admitted, is found in the reported cases, where the record presents the case of a blank indorsement by a third party, made before the instrument is indorsed by the payee and before it is delivered to take effect, the question being whether the party is to be deemed an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser. Irreconcilable conflict exists in that regard; but there is one principle upon the subject almost universally admitted by them all, and that is that the interpretation of the contract ought in every case to be such as will carry into effect the intention of the parties; and in most cases it is admitted that proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction is admissible to aid in the interpretation of the language employed. Denton v. Peters, L. R. 5 Q. B. 475. Facts and circumstances attendant at the time the contract was made are competent evidence for the purpose of placing the court in the same situation and giving the court the same advantages for construing the contract which were possessed by the actors. Cavazos v. Trevino, 6 Wall. 773, 18 L. ed. 813."

It must constantly be borne in mind that the acceptance of a bill makes the acceptor the principal debtor. A bill, when accepted, becomes similar to a promissory note; the acceptor being the promisor, and the drawer standing in the relation of an indorser. Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 532. There is nothing in the negotiable instruments law to indicate an intention on the part of the legislature to change the rule as established in this state, relating to the receipt of parol evidence to determine the primary liability as between the persons whose names appear upon the instrument, or as between those secondarily liable thereon. By § 55 of the negotiable instruments law it is provided: "An accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such a person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder at the time of taking the instrument knew him to be only an accommodation party." Parol evidence is necessary to determine whether a party to an instrument, including an indorser thereon, is an accommodation party, and also to determine which other party to the instrument he had accommodated. The plaintiff was the holder of the note for value, and the evidence showed that the defendant was an accommodation indorser for the benefit of the acceptor. The last subdivision of § 114, as we have quoted, makes parol evidence necessary to establish whether the indorser signed the instrument for the accommodation of the payee. It is true that this section does not expressly state that, if the indorser signed for the accommodation of the acceptor, he is liable to all parties subsequent to the acceptor; but the fact that such a provision is not included in § 114 does not prevent the admission of parol evidence to determine generally the questions relating to an accommodation party as provided by § 55. The negotiable instruments law, by § 7, provides: "In any case not provided for in this act the rules of the law merchant shall govern." By § 118 of the negotiable instruments law it is provided: "As respects one another, indorsers are liable prima facie in the order in which they indorse; but evidence is admissible to show that, as between or among themselves, they have agreed otherwise." As we have seen, upon the acceptance of the bill the acceptor becomes the principal debtor and the one primarily liable to pay the amount of the bill, and all other parties to the instrument, including the maker and indorser, are secondarily liable. We are of the opinion that the maker of the bill is in legal effect and within the intention of this section an indorser, and that, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, parol evidence is authorized to determine the liability as between them.

The articles of the negotiable instruments law relating to the presentation of bills and notes for payment and notice of dishonor (articles 7 and 8) further show an intention by the legislature to leave the order of liability among those whose names are on the instrument subject to determination by any competent evidence. Section 130 provides: "Presentment for payment is not necessary in order to charge the person primarily liable on the instrument. . . . But, except as herein otherwise provided, presentment for payment is necessary in order to charge the drawer and indorsers." Section 139 provides: "Presentment for payment is not required in order to charge the drawer where he has no right to expect or require that the drawee or acceptor will pay the instrument." Section 140 provides: "Presentment for payment is not required in order to charge an indorser where the instrument was made or accepted for his accommodation, and he has no reason to expect that the instrument will be paid if presented." Section 160 provides: "Except as herein otherwise provided, when a negotiable instrument has been dishonored by nonacceptance or nonpayment, notice of dishonor must be given to the drawer and to each indorser, and any drawer or indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged." Section 186 provides: "Notice of dishonor is not required to be given to an indorser in either of the following cases: . . . (3) Where the instrument was made or accepted for his accommodation."

There is no reason that we can conceive why the legislature should intend to change the rule in regard to the admission of parol evidence as it had existed in this state for many years. All of the quotations that we have made from the negotiable instruments law show that it has enlarged rather than restricted the rules allowing parol evidence to show the true liability and relation of the parties whose names appear upon the bill or note, in all actions between themselves. It is certainly very material to the drawer of a bill whether an indorser signs it at his request, or at the request and for the benefit of the acceptor. We do not think it was the intention of the legislature, by the enactment of § 114 of the negotiable instruments law, to establish a rule as to the liability of an irregular indorser conclusive on the parties to the instrument as between themselves in an action where the facts showing a different intention are fully alleged. All of the decisions of our courts since the enactment of the negotiable instruments law tend to sustain the views herein expressed. Corn v. Levy, 97 App. Div. 48, 89 N. Y. Supp. 658; Kohn v. Consolidated Butter & Egg Co. 30 Misc. 725, 63 N. Y. Supp. 265. In the case last mentioned McAdam, J., said: "Prior to the statute of 1897, supra, the allegation referred to was a necessary one in such cases, and, if denied, the onus of proving the allegation was on the plaintiff, for the payee was presumably the first indorser. Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. § 704; Wood's Byles's Bills, 151, note, and cases before cited. Since the statute the legal presumption is changed where the complaint alleges that the irregular indorsers indorsed the paper 'before delivery' to the payee; and, when this fact is established, the onus is cast upon such indorsers to allege and prove that, notwithstanding such delivery, the payee was to become first indorser according to the customary form of the contract, and that they did not indorse for the purpose of lending their credit to the maker or with the intention of becoming liable to the payee. That this is the proper interpretation of the act is obvious. The true intention of indorsers as between themselves can always be shown by oral evidence. Dan. Neg. Inst. supra; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. 2d ed. pp. 492 et seq.; Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 386; Cady v. Shepard, 12 Wis. 639; Benjamin's Chambers' Bills, 2d Am. ed. 250; Witherow v. Slayback, 158 N. Y. 649, 70 Am. St. Rep. 507, 58 N. E. 681. To go further, and decide that the statute intended to create an incontestable liability against irregular indorsers, would be to impute to the legislative wisdom a design repugnant to every notion of judicial procedure, especially in a provision enacted in the interest of law reform."

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

CONTINENTAL WALL PAPER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

LEWIS VOIGHT & SONS COMPANY.

Monopoly — wall-paper trust — validity.

1. A contract by all the manufacturers of a necessary household commodity, for the creation of a corporation to sell their entire product at fixed prices, in which they shall be sole stockholders in proportion to their output immediately before its formation, which prevents increase of output by any stockholder and requires makers of the machinery used by them, and the jobbers of their product, who are located in every state, to become parties to the agreement, so as to prevent all competition in the business, violates the anti-trust act of Congress.

Same — sale — purchase price — enforcement.

2. Jobbers who are compelled to become parties to a general undertaking between manufacturers of a household necessity for the creation of a corporation to act as their sales agent for the purpose of stifling competition between them, which is void under the Federal anti-trust act, cannot be compelled by the sales agent to pay for goods purchased under and in accordance with the agreement.

(January 5, 1907.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the contract price for goods sold and delivered. Affirmed.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

This is an action to recover a balance of $57,762.10, due on account for wall paper sold and delivered to defendants. The case turned upon the sufficiency of the third defense submitted by the answer to the petition of the plaintiff. To this defense the plaintiff demurred. This demurrer was overruled. The plaintiff declined to plead further, whereupon judgment was rendered for the defendants, dismissing the petition, and taxing the plaintiff with costs. The defense so held to be sufficient was in substance: First. That the plaintiff is a member of an illegal combination among the manufacturers of wall paper, formed for the purpose of enhancing prices, stifling competition, and restraining freedom of commerce between the states and with foreign nations, being such a combination or trust as is forbidden by the anti-trust act of 1890 (act July 2, 1890, chap. 647, 26 Stat. at L.

Note. — As to the validity of agreements collateral to contracts forming illegal combinations, see case note to Freed v. American F. Ins. Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 368; also note to Whitwell v. Continental Tobacco Co. 64 L.R.A. 689.

CONTINENTAL WALL PAPER Co. v. LEWIS VOIGHT & SONS Co. was affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. See 212 U. S. 227, 53 L. ed. —, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280. In affirming the judgment of the circuit court of appeals, the court based its judgment of affirmance on the ground that the plaintiff, in legal effect, sought the aid of the court to enforce a contract for the sale and purchase of goods, which, as admitted by the demurrer, was in fact and was intended by the parties to be based upon agreements that were the essential parts of an illegal scheme; that the account sued on was made up in execution of an agreement that constituted, or out of which came, the illegal combination formed for the purpose and with the effect of both restraining and monopolizing trade and commerce among the several states. The question considered by the court, as stated by it, was whether the plaintiff company could have judgment upon an account which, as admitted by demurrer, was made up, in the knowledge of both seller and buyer, with direct reference to and in execution of certain agreements under which an illegal combination, represented by the seller, was organized. Considering this matter, the court said: "The plaintiff comes into court admitting that it is an illegal combination whose operations restrain and monopolize commerce and trade among the states, and asks a judgment that will give effect, as far as it goes, to agreements that constituted that combination, and by means of which the combination proposes to accomplish forbidden ends. We hold that such a judgment cannot be granted without departing from the statutory rule, long established in the jurisprudence of both this country and England, that a court will not lend its aid, in any way, to a party seeking to realize the fruits of an agreement that appears to be tainted with illegality, although the result of applying that rule may sometimes be to shield one who has got something for which, as between man and man, he ought, perhaps, to pay, but for which he is unwilling to pay."

209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), and by the laws of Ohio. Second. That the defendants were compelled to become parties to the illegal combination, and that the contract upon which this suit depends, for price and terms of sale, constitutes one of the agreements which go to make up the illegal combination represented by the Continental Wall Paper Company. The answer, embodying the defense here involved, in substance avers: That the National Paper company, a corporation owning or controlling a large number of wall-paper factories situated within the states of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, together with a large number of independent firms and corporations engaged in the same manufacture, combined or conspired together for the purpose of controlling the wall-paper production in this country by suppressing competition among themselves, and enhancing the price of that article to jobbers, wholesalers, retailers, and consumers. That, for this purpose and this end, and to better cover this scheme, they caused the organization under the laws of New York of a corporation known as the Continental Wall Paper Company, with a capital stock of $200,000, divided into 16,000 shares, the shares to be divided among the conspiring firms and corporations in proportion to the production of each factory during the year preceding July, 1898. That the scheme and agreement was that the National Wall Paper Company, as representative of a large number of corporations dominated by it, should select three directors, the other firms and corporations three more, and that the six directors so selected should select a seventh, and the seven directors should direct the combination through the corporate name of the Continental Wall Paper Company. That the plan was that each of the combining concerns should enter into a contract, styling themselves "vendors," with the said company. These contracts to be signed by the several corporations and firms entering into this combination were identical in terms, and were in the following words and figures:

Exhibit 1.

This agreement, made this _____ day of _____, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, by and between _____, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of _____ (hereinafter called the "vendor"), party of the first part, and the Continental Wall Paper Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York (hereinafter called the "company"), party of the second part: Whereas, the vendor is engaged in the manufacture and sale of wall paper, borders, and other articles usually produced and handled in connection therewith, and the company is desirous of acting as its selling agent in handling the entire product of the vendor; and whereas, the company has an authorized capital of $200,000 divided into 16,000 shares, of the par value of $12.50 each; and whereas, the dealer is desirous of acquiring _____ shares of the stock of said company at par, and to that end has offered to enter into this agreement and to secure the performance thereof by the deposit of said shares: Now, therefore, in consideration of the foregoing recitals, and for other good and valuable consideration, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The vendor hereby sells unto the company, and the latter agrees to purchase, the entire product of wall paper that may be manufactured by the vendor for the period from July 20, 1898, to the first day of July, 1899. The prices at which the merchandise shall be sold to the company are set forth in a schedule hereto annexed marked "A," and hereby made a part of this agreement. The vendor further grants unto the company the right to two renewals of said contract of one year each, provided that, in the event of the election of the company to avail itself of either of said renewals, it shall so signify in writing to the vendor before the first day of June next preceding the renewal term, and provided, further, that such election to renew shall be accompanied by the written consents of all the registered stockholders of the company, including that of the vendor.

Second. The goods acquired by the company from the vendor hereunder, which are to be sold to jobbers, shall be sold by the company, and not by the vendor, for the account of the company. Such sale shall be made by the company at discounts from road prices fixed in the schedule hereto annexed marked "B," which is hereby made part of this agreement. The vendor will deliver such goods upon the direction of the company, at the risk and for the account of the latter, f. o. b. at the place of manufacture, provided, however, that in all cases in which the goods are manufactured at places other than the cities of New York or Philadelphia, the vendor will equalize the freights with either of said cities out of the proceeds receivable for such goods. Memorandum invoices shall be supplied to the customer and to the company immediately upon the shipment and delivery of such goods, said invoices specifying quantities and road prices.

Third. There shall be furnished by the vendor to the company on the 7th, 14th, 21st, and last days of each month (except when those days fall on Sundays, and then on the next succeeding day), a just and true statement of all shipments and deliveries of merchandise included in this contract which the vendor may make for the account of the company, which statement shall contain the names of the purchasers, the character of the goods sold, and the prices at which they were sold, to the end that the company may make the proper charges, and in order to entitle the vendor to be credited with the agreed cost price for such goods. Each of such statements of shipments shall be accompanied by an affidavit of one of the officers of the vendor and of one of its bookkeepers and of one of its shipping clerks, to the effect that the information therein contained is true.

Fourth. The company shall permit the vendor to sell in its own name, and the latter hereby agrees to sell for the account of the company, such of the goods manufactured by the vendor as are to be disposed of to purchasers not classified as jobbers, which sales shall be made at the cost and expense of the vendor; said vendor hereby guaranteeing all credits and the collection of all accounts connected with such sales. The prices at which and the terms upon which such goods are to be sold are designated in this agreement as the "road prices," and are contained in a schedule hereto annexed marked "C," which is hereby made a part of this agreement. On the 7th, 14th, 21st, and last days of each month (except when those days fall on Sundays, and then on the next succeeding days), the vendor will furnish to the company a statement showing all the shipments made on account of such sales, which statements shall contain the names of the purchasers, the character of the goods, and the prices at which they were sold, and such sales shall be credited to the vendor by the company at the prices fixed in schedule A, and shall be charged against said vendor at the prices at which they were sold, which shall in no event be less than those designated in schedule C. The vendor is to receive for its services and expenses connected with such sales and allowances discounts equal to those who are designated in a classification made by the parties hereto as "second-class jobbers," less the discounts made on sales to purchasers designated in the accompanying schedules as "quantitative purchasers," on which the vendor has allowed the quantitative discount, except that where special and exclusive goods are sold there shall be an allowance of 30 per cent discount to the vendor. The prices of goods as fixed by schedules A and C may be altered from time to time, but the discounts allowed to jobbers shall not be altered at any time during the term of this agreement.

Fifth. The vendor will make collection of all accounts for goods sold by it for the account of the company under the provisions of this agreement, except for sales to jobbers (which accounts the company is to collect), and will, on the 10th day of each and every month during the term of this agreement, account to the company. Such account shall be accompanied by a payment by the vendor to the company of the difference between the prices at which the goods are agreed to be sold to the company as embodied in schedule A, and the prices at which the vendor has agreed to dispose of said goods as contained in schedule C. The purchases made by the company from the vendor hereunder shall be upon the same credit and terms as those accorded to other dealers, but the company shall have the right to anticipate the due date of all such purchases, and will pay, on the 10th day of each month, to the vendor, a sum on account of all shipments of the preceding month equal to not less than 30 per cent of the road prices of goods shipped to jobbers by the company.

Sixth. The vendor hereby grants unto the company the right, and it shall be the duty of the latter, through its officers selected for that purpose, to audit the books of account of the vendor as to production, sales, and shipments, at such times and in such manner as the company may, from time to time, deem necessary or proper. This provision is of the essence of the agreement, and a failure on the part of the vendor to faithfully perform the same shall operate as a breach of the contract, entitling the company to abrogate the agreement, and to such damages as it may be able to establish in addition to the absolute transfer and surrender to it of the stock to be pledged as hereinafter provided.

Seventh. There shall be a committee selected from the company, to be known as the "auditing committee," which shall be made up from among the directors. Said committee shall have power to establish such a system of bookkeeping as in its judgment may be advisable. In order to conform as nearly as may be to the laws of the various states in which the factories of the vendor are located, it is understood that the vendor shall not be at liberty to require from the company the acceptance of the product of more than ten hours per day of any one of said factories. The product intended to be sold to the company hereunder, and which the latter undertakes to acquire, does not contemplate the enlargement of the manufacturing facilities of the vendor; but nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting the right of the vendor to substitute new machinery of the same capacity for any now in use which may become useless through wear or through destruction by fire or other casualty. The power to designate the parties who are to be classed as jobbers, and the discounts to which they are entitled, is expressly reserved by the company, and such designation is to be made through its board of directors; but the vendor shall have the right to select the jobbers through whom the goods manufactured by it are to be distributed, and to designate the amount of its goods such jobbers may buy, subject to such credit limitations as the board of directors may impose. All orders placed with the vendor by jobbers on behalf of the company must be at once reported to the latter.

Eighth. The company hereby agrees to sell and the vendor agrees to purchase — shares of the common stock of the company, for which stock the vendor agrees to pay the sum of — in cash as soon after the execution and delivery of this agreement as the same may be demanded by the company; but only if and when the entire share capital of the company shall have been fully subscribed at not less than par. The vendor will, after paying for said shares of stock, indorse the certificates representing the same, and deliver the certificates so indorsed in blank to the company, upon the trust and agreement that the company shall hold said certificates as security for the performance by the vendor of each and all of the covenants and conditions of this agreement; and upon the refusal, neglect, or omission of the vendor, its successors or assigns, to perform this agreement, or any part thereof, the said shares of stock and the certificates represented thereby shall be immediately sold by the company at public or private sale, without notice, upon such terms and at such price as the company or its officers may deem reasonable and that the proceeds of sale be paid into the treasury of the company as the agreed and liquidated damages to the company for the breach of said agreement. The parties hereto have fixed upon the said stock and the proceeds thereof as liquidated damages, because of the difficulty in establishing, in a court of law, the actual damage that would be suffered by the company in the event of the refusal, neglect, or omission to perform this agreement, and in order to avoid the difficulty of such proof.

In witness whereof, the vendor and the company have respectively caused this agreement to be executed by their respective presidents, and their respective corporate seals to be hereto attached, pursuant to resolutions of their respective boards of directors, the day and year first above written.

It would unduly lengthen this statement to fully set out the schedules referred to in the above exhibit, and made a part of the 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

contract between the so-called vendors and the company. The answer then avers that the prices to be charged the company for the product of each so-called vendor was the estimated cost of production and incidental expense to such manufacturer of carrying out his or its part of the contract. Schedule A of the contract sets out the "list price" of all qualities of paper, and in a parallel column the sale price to the company. Schedule B sets out the sale price by the company to the several classes of jobbers, which the company binds itself to exact, and the terms of sale. The gross sale price in this schedule is the list price of schedule A, with a discount, which depends upon the classification of jobbers provided for by the seventh clause of the contract. Schedule C sets out the sale price to purchasers "other than jobbers" and terms of sale, these prices being also designated as "road prices." These prices are the "list prices" of schedules A and B, with no discount. To purchasers described as "other than jobbers" certain discounts are provided, dependent upon quantity. Under clause 7 of the contract, set out above, "the company," acting through its directors selected in the manner heretofore mentioned, is given authority to classify jobbers, and prescribe the discount to each class; each "vendor" being allowed "to select the jobbers through whom the goods manufactured by it are to be distributed, and to designate the amount of its goods such jobbers may buy."

"The distribution of profit over cost to the company may be illustrated by taking two classes of wall paper, one a cheap kind and the other more expensive. Thus, the list price of wall paper styled "Brown" is 4 cents per bolt; the sale price to the company 2 cents. The price by the company to "jobbers" in the first class is 4 cents, with a discount of 20 per cent; to "jobbers" in the second class, 4 cents, with a discount of 17½ per cent; to "jobbers" in the third class, 4 cents, with a discount of 15 per cent. The selling price to all purchasers other than those classified as jobbers is fixed at 4 cents flat, unless a discount of small proportions is obtained as a result of a purchase bringing the buyer within the terms of those called "quantity purchasers." "Embossed bronzes" of one class are listed 18 cents per bolt; jobbers being allowed a discount of 45 per cent, 40 per cent, or 30 per cent, according to the class they have been placed in. All the schedules contain a provision for the equalization of freights with certain cities, thus eliminating advantages due to locality. It is further averred in said defense that the companies, corporations, and firms which organized said company, and which subsequently subscribed for stock and signed one of the agreements like that heretofore set forth, constituted 98 per cent of all the manufacturers of wall paper in this country. It is further stated that, for better carrying out of said combination, agreements were made by the plaintiff with parties, companies, and corporations within the United States and Canada, "by which each agreed not to compete with the other nor cut prices, the Americans in Canada and the Canadians in the United States." It is also alleged that to further carry out the purpose to prevent competition and enhance prices, that a contract was made between plaintiff and John Waldron & Son and the Kaukauna Machine Company, the only two manufacturers of wall-paper machinery in the United States, one having a manufactory in New Brunswick, New Jersey, and the other a manufactory in Kaukauna, Wisconsin, by which said manufacturers agreed, during the existence of the plaintiff, to sell wall-paper machinery only to it and said combination, and not to any mills preparing to start. It is then averred that all wholesale dealers in the United States were arbitrarily divided into two classes,—jobbers and "road" or "quantity buyers,"—and that the jobbers were arbitrarily divided into the three classes heretofore mentioned, and the other wholesalers into "road" or "quantity buyers" and "special buyers," with the purpose that all should then be compelled to sign written agreements obligating themselves to buy their entire stock of merchandise from the plaintiff direct, or through members of the combination, and to this end identical printed agreements were presented to all jobbers and wholesalers throughout the United States and the territories, by which each obligated itself to buy their entire purchases of wall paper from said plaintiff at list prices of schedule A, heretofore set out, subject to discounts shown by schedule accompanying each such agreement; and binding each such jobber or wholesaler not to sell at prices lower or better than those shown by another schedule accompanying each such agreement. A copy of the agreement, so required to be signed by each jobber and wholesaler, is made a part of the answer as "Exhibit 2." Same is here set out below.

An agreement made this ——— day of ———, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, between the Continental Wall Paper Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York (hereinafter called the "company"), party of the first part, and ——— 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of ——— (hereinafter called the "jobber"), party of the second part. In consideration of the sum of $1, paid by the jobber unto the company for the granting of this agreement, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other valuable considerations, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows: First. That the company will sell, subject to such credit limitations as it may impose, and the jobber will purchase, the entire requirements of the jobber in his business of selling wall paper for the business year ending July 1, 1899, to the amount of a gross value, without discounts, of ———, the jobber reserving to himself the right to purchase such merchandise as he may need in excess of ——— from others. The company is to deliver the goods without additional charge f. o. b. at New York or Philadelphia, or to equalize freights from the places at which it makes deliveries to either of said cities. Second. The jobber shall be allowed discounts at the rates shown in the accompanying schedule marked "A," which is hereby embodied in this agreement as a part thereof. The terms of payment to be as follows: Four months from the date of invoice, with discount at the rate of 1 per cent per month for anticipated payment; provided settlement be made within thirty days from date of shipment either by cash or note. Invoices for all goods shipped between October 15th and March 1st to take the latter date. Third. Attached hereto marked "B" is a schedule of the road prices at which the company sells its goods for the term embraced in this contract to dealers other than jobbers, and also a statement of discounts allowed to such customers other than jobbers for quantity purchases, together with the terms of credit and freight allowance to which such customers are entitled. It is an essential condition of this agreement that the jobber will not directly or indirectly sell or offer for sale any of the merchandise purchased from the company hereunder at lower prices or upon better or more favorable terms than those shown in schedule B; the intent hereof being to assure the company against the use by the jobbers of this agreement to undersell the company. The prompt performance by the jobber of the provisions of this agreement as to payment and otherwise is a condition precedent to exacting the continuous performance of said agreement by the company.

In witness whereof the company has caused this instrument to be executed, and the jobber has hereunto set his hand the day and year first above written.

tical with schedule B of the agreement between "vendors and the company," heretofore set out, and schedule B, attached to and made a part of Exhibit 2, above set out in full, is same as schedule C attached to Exhibit 1, heretofore set out.

It is charged that "the immediate, intended, and direct effect of said combination and agreements was the stifling of competition between said manufacturers and vendors of wall paper and between jobbers and wholesalers thereof, and to unduly enhance the price of wall paper, making it one half more than the price which it would be if same had been left to free and unrestricted competition." It is further distinctly averred that by these agreements and contracts aforesaid the entire wall-paper trade throughout the United States passed into the hands of the plaintiff company, and that it "threatened defendant that, unless it signed said agreement (Exhibit 2, set out above), no wall paper would be sold to it; that said combination would make it impossible for it to buy wall paper or to continue its business, and would drive it out of its said business, and compel it to sacrifice the good will owned by it, as aforesaid, and the capital invested by it in said business." It is further averred that the defendant conducted for many years a large business in wall paper at Cincinnati, selling to retailers and consumers in Ohio and other states of the Union. That the defendant, finding it impossible to continue business without signing said agreement shown in Exhibit 2, did sign and become a member of said combination. The defendant charges that, under the contract so signed by him, he purchased more than $200,000 worth of wall paper, and that the prices he was compelled to pay were extortionate and unreasonable, and more than 50 per cent greater than they would have been had competition between wall-paper makers not been completely suppressed by the agreements between such manufacturers and said corporation:

Argued before Lurton and Seveyens, Circuit Judges, and Cochran, District Judge.

Messrs. Louis Marshall and Joseph Wilby, for plaintiff in error:

Assuming that the organization of the plaintiff was for the purpose of restraining competition and enhancing prices, the defendant has no defense, under common-law considerations, to the action brought against it to recover for goods sold and delivered.

Assuming that the clause contained in the contract which prohibited the defendant from selling any of the merchandise purchased from the plaintiff, at lower prices than those specified in the schedule annexed, was illegal, the only effect of such illegality would be to nullify that provision, and not to prevent the plaintiff from recovering for merchandise actually received and kept by the defendant.

A contract in restraint of trade, though on its face not unreasonable, and hence not void at common law, may become such if it is simply a part of a general scheme, or one step towards the accomplishment of that purpose, to restrain competition and establish a monopoly.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It has been urged that the defense to the claim in suit must fail upon either of two grounds: First, that the contract between the plaintiff corporation and the manufacturers of wall paper does not contain any stipulations beyond those admissible and essential to protect the contracting parties in securing reasonable prices and against unreasonable and demoralizing competition; second, that if it be conceded that the agreement does constitute an unlawful combination in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, that that fact affords no defense to a suit for the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendant. These in their order.

As to the first point, it need only be said that the legality of the contract between the combining companies at common law, as imposing only a reasonable restraint upon the freedom of competition, is not a defense if the dominant purpose of the agreement and the direct result of its operation is to directly, and not incidentally, restrain freedom of commerce between the states or with foreign nations. Until the Supreme Court shall otherwise hold, we feel concluded by the meaning placed upon the act by United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25; Chesapeake & O. Fuel Co. v. United States, 53 C. C. A. 256, 115 Fed. 610; and not departed from in Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 331, 48 L. ed. 679, 697, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436. But we think the combination and agreement shown by Exhibit 1 comes within the prohibition of the act of Congress, whether that act be aimed only at unreasonable restraints or not. That contract and agreement is one between 98 per cent of all the wall-paper makers in the United States, who co-operate through a corporation organized by them for the single purpose of selling their gross product. That there shall be no competition between the combined companies is insured by the agreement that each manufacturer shall sell his entire product at an agreed price to the plaintiff corporation, which is to nominally make all sales, either directly or indirectly, at a uniform price, subject to an agreed scale of discounts, varying only according to an arbitrary classification of buyers. The difference between the price at which the so-called "vendors" sell to the plaintiff company and the price exacted from those who buy from it will be profit, and the profits will constitute the dividends to be distributed to plaintiff's shareholders, and plaintiff's shareholders are exclusively composed of the combining companies, called "vendors;" its comparatively insignificant amount of stock being placed with these vendors in proportion to the product of the year before the combine took effect. To prevent the enlargement of the product of any one of the vendors, it is provided, in effect, that there shall be no enlargement of plant, though new machinery may be used to replace old or that destroyed.

To insure a monopoly of the business to themselves, and keep strangers out of it, it is alleged, and not denied, that the only two manufacturers of wall-paper machinery in the United States became parties to the combination by agreeing to sell no machinery to strangers, and to confine their sales to the combine. To add to the protective force of the tariff duties tending to keep out foreign products, it is also averred that an agreement was made with Canadian paper makers to protect each other against any cutting of prices. To insure against any kicking out of the agreement or violations in any way, each member is required to indorse its shares in the Continental Wall Paper Company to that corporation, which is to hold and apply the same as liquidated damages in case of any breach. But that there should be no inducement to fly the contract, the scheme contemplated that every wholesale buyer should engage himself to buy his entire supply from the combine; and to secure the engagement of each such jobber or wholesaler to the scheme, no paper was to be sold to such as did not sign. This made the contract practically unbreakable, for if a factory should weary of the monopoly, it could find no jobbers or wholesalers free to buy its product, and it would be driven to rely upon such orders as it could get from retailers or consumers. That this union of former competitors—a union embracing substantially all of the wall-paper mills in the land (for the 2 per cent left out may be ignored as an active competition)—should result in an unreasonable enhancement of prices is precisely what we might anticipate. Wall paper is a product of universal necessity, and the consumers are found in every household. Every principle of economic law instructs us that under such conditions there will be an enhancement of price, limited only by the unknown boundary of human greed and corporate avarice. It is therefore not to be doubted that the averment confessed by the pleading, that prices have been advanced 50 per cent, is substantially true. The conspiring mills were situated in many states. The consumers embraced the whole citizenship of the United States. The jobbers and wholesalers who were to be coerced into contracts to buy their entire demands from the Continental Wall Paper Company, or be driven out of business, were in every state.

Before the combination, each of the combining companies was engaged in both state and interstate commerce. The freedom of each, with respect to prices and terms, was restrained by the agreement, and interstate commerce directly affected thereby, as well as by the enhancement of prices which resulted. A more complete monopoly in an article of universal use has probably never been brought about. It may be that the wit of man may yet devise a more complete scheme to accomplish the stifling of competition; but none of the shifts resorted to for suppressing freedom of commerce and securing undue prices, shown by the reported cases, is half so complete in its details. None of the schemes with which this may be compared is more certain in results, more widespread in its operation, and more evil in its purposes. It must fall within the definition of a "restraint of trade," whether we confine ourselves to the common-law interpretation of that term, or apply that given to the term as used in the Federal act by the cases we have cited above.

This brings us to the vital question in the case, which is the bearing of the fact that the plaintiff is but the corporate hand of an illegal combination under the anti-trust law of 1890, upon the liability of the defendants in this action for the price of wall paper bought from the illegal combine. The contention is that the contract upon which the action is brought is wholly collateral to any contract between the plaintiff and the other members of the illegal combination. But if the contract to pay for the goods included in the account sued upon is only part of an entire agreement which includes stipulations which are illegal, the case of the plaintiff must fail. It is elementary law that the courts will not lend assistance in any way in carrying out an illegal agreement. McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 654, 43 L. ed. 1117, 1123, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 839; Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 348, 33 L. ed. 172, 177, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776. Nor can a plaintiff show only such part of an entire agreement as is legal, and sue upon that alone. The whole must come. See cases just cited. If the combination had stopped with the agreement between the manufacturers and the plaintiff, by which the competition between the makers of wall paper had been obviated and a uniform sale price settled, this fact would have been no defense for the price of goods sold by the illegal combination to a stranger. If the defendants had been injured in their business by such an illegal method of enhancing prices, their only remedy would have been a direct action for damages, under § 7 of the anti-trust act (26 Stat. at L. 210, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3202). W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307; Atlanta v. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works Co. 64 L.R.A. 721, 61 C. C. A. 387, 127 Fed. 23; and Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 551, 552, 46 L. ed. 679, 686, 687, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431. If the illegal agreement in restraint of trade had included only a contract between the manufacturers themselves, the defendants and all other jobbers would at least have had the privilege APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Lee County overruling a demurrer to an answer setting up a counterclaim for breach of contract in an action brought to recover the purchase price of an engine and materials. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

court, after reviewing the possibilities of failure in the manufacture of glass, and as especially applied to a new business, said: "Then there are the mishaps which usually attend the establishing of a new industry,—the delay or failure in obtaining suitable material, the breaking of machinery, accidents in the application of natural gas, which was an untried fuel, or resulting from the careless or unskilful acts of employees, a misfortune in the melt of the glass, which sometimes occurs, breaking utensils or appliances that would have caused both delay and expense. It will be conceded that only a small proportion of the industrial enterprises attempted are successful, and a much fewer number of them realize profits during the first ten months of their existence. If it had been an established business, or if other manufactories of a like kind existed in Kansas under similar conditions, there would be some basis of estimating profits; but we fail to find any safe guide in measuring the gains that would have been made by this factory if fuel had been supplied."

In Thompson v. Corbin, 41 N. S. 386, it was held that, for the delivering of defective machinery necessary to the making of laths, the damages recoverable were for the loss of use of the mill, but not for wages and board of the men, and, the business being a new one, anticipated profits could not be recovered.

In Consumers' Pure Ice Co. v. Jenkins, 58 Ill. App. 519, it was held that, for the delay in delivering an ice machine, the profits which a party about to embark in a new business would have made are too remote to be recovered, the proper measure of damages being the value of the use of the machinery.

Other cases holding that the prospective profits of a new business cannot be recovered as damages, but that the true measure of damages is the rental value of the business while idle, are Benton v. Fay, 64 Ill. 417 (failure to deliver planing mill); Chicago City R. Co. v. Howison, 86 Ill. 215 (injunction preventing extension of street railway); Creamery Package Mfg. Co. v. Benton County Creamery Co. 120 Iowa, 584, 95 N. W. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

188 (delay in putting ice plant in creamery); Central Trust Co. v. Arctic Ice Mach. Mfg. Co. 77 Md. 202, 26 Atl. 493 (delay in delivering ice machines); Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Ragsdale, 46 Miss. 458 (failure of carrier to deliver machinery for sawmill); Rogers v. Bemus, 69 Pa. 432 (breach of contract to lay foundation for sawmill and furnish money for its erection); Fraser v. Echo Min. & Smelting Co. 9 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 28 S. W. 714 (delay in furnishing mining machinery).

An interesting case on this question is State v. Durkin, 65 Kan. 101, 68 Pac. 1091, where it was held that for the wrongful interference with plumbers who had not been in business any length of time a plumber's mutual-benefit association could not be held liable for lost profits.

In many cases involving a new business, or one in contemplation, the courts have applied the rule concerning prospective profits and the measure of damages above stated, without expressly recognizing any distinction between such a case and one where the business was already established and in operation.

Thus, in Novelty Iron Works v. Capital City Oat-meal Co. 88 Iowa, 524, 55 N. W. 518, it was held that, for the failure of a contractor to complete an oatmeal mill by the time agreed upon, the measure of damages is the rental value of the mill during the time of the delay, and not the profits which, under the particular circumstances, the owner might have realized from it during that time, such rental value to be determined, however, by the cost of the mill, wear and tear of the machinery, and profits which might be made from its use.

Without attempting to exhaust this class of cases, the following also hold that prospective profits cannot be recovered, but that the injured party may recover only the rental value: Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314, 71 Am. Dec. 635 (failure to complete gristmill within stipulated time); McKinnon v. McEwan, 48 Mich. 106, 42 Am. Rep. 458, 11 N. W. 828 (failure to furnish and connect boilers necessary to steam mill and salt block); Taylor v. Maguire, 12 Mo. 313, fol-

49, 53; Newbrough v. Walker, 8 Gratt. 16, 56 Am. Dec. 127.

The difference between the profits realized and the profits which might have been realized is not recoverable as damages.

Blagen v. Thompson, 23 Or. 239, 18 L.R.A. 315, 31 Pac. 647; Sitton v. Macdonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484; Martin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616.

The contract must be made with reference to the damages which may arise.

lowed by 13 Mo. 517 (failure to deliver boat hull within stipulated time); Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718 (failure to deliver machinery necessary to sawmill); Boyle v. Reeder, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 607 (failure to deliver machinery for sawmill); Critchler v. Porter-McNeal Co. 135 N. C. 542, 47 S. E. 604 (failure to deliver proper machinery for sawmill); Dixon-Woods Co. v. Phillips Glass Co. 169 Pa. 167, 32 Atl. 432 (alleged failure to put in proper machinery for glassworks); Finch v. Heermans, 5 Luzerne Leg. Reg. 125 (delay in construction of sawmill); Charles E. Dustin Co. v. St. Petersburg Invest. Co. 126 Fed. 816 (delay in delivery of machinery for running electric railway and light plant).

Prospective profits as damages were also denied in Blanchard v. Ely, 21 Wend. 342, 34 Am. Dec. 250, where, because of the placing of defective machinery in a new boat, several trips were lost.

In Hoskins v. Scott (Or.) 96 Pac. 1112, it was held, in an action for breach of contract to furnish an engine and engineers to operate a threshing machine during the threshing season, no enforceable contracts for threshing having been made, that the prospective profits could not be recovered; but that plaintiff was entitled to show as general damages the rental value of the machine during the season, if idle by reason of lack of the power contracted for, provided plaintiff was unable to procure an engine elsewhere; but, if an engine was procured elsewhere, he would be entitled to show, in lieu of the rental value, the difference between what he was to pay defendant and what he was compelled to pay others, including expenses incidental to the change.

In Davis v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 23, it was held that, for the failure to deliver within a reasonable time a boiler necessary for the running of a sawmill, the measure of damages would be the actual expenses incurred, both for traveling to ascertain what had become of the boiler and for preparations made for its reception, and the interest on the value of the property during the time of detention; the profits which might have been made as well as the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. McLeod & Dennis also for appellant.

Messrs. McLendon & Tatum for respondents.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges an indebtedness of the defendants to the plaintiff of $317.20, the price of a lot of roofing and a 12 by 14 Clarke engine. The answer, as a counterclaim, sets up damages to the amount of $1,995 for breach of contract of sale. The appeal is from an order of the circuit judge overruling a demurrer to the answer.

Shortly stated, the substantial allegations of the answer on which the counterclaim rests are: The defendants, merchants do-wages paid an engineer employed in anticipation of the completion of the mill, being too contingent to authorize a recovery therefor.

In Curran v. Smith, 81 C. C. A. 537, 149 Fed. 945, affirming 138 Fed. 150, it was held that, in an action for damages for breach of contract to construct a pipe line for water and irrigation purposes, the anticipated profits, which, under the evidence, were too uncertain, speculative, and doubtful, could not be recovered, nor the expenditures made by plaintiffs in connection with the project prior to the contract; but only those expenditures could be recovered which were made by them in reliance upon the contract after it was made.

In British Columbia & V. I. Spar, Lumber & Saw-Mill Co. v. Nettleship, L. R. 3 C. P. 499, it was held that for failure of a carrier to deliver machinery necessary to the erection of a sawmill it was liable only for the cost of replacing the lost articles at the place of delivery, with interest.

However, it was held in Wade v. Haycock, 25 Pa. 382, that for the negligent construction of a gristmill the measure of damages would be the expense of the new work and the profits of the mill for such time as it was necessarily stopped from running while the alterations were being made.

In Priestly v. Northern Indiana & C. R. Co. 26 Ill. 205, 79 Am. Dec. 369, it was held that, in an action against a common carrier for not delivering machinery necessary to the running of a new factory, transported by it, in proper time, the measure of damages, in the absence of allegations of special damages, is the value of the use of the machinery during the period of improper detention. The court, in this case, said: "As this is an action on the case for a wrong done, had the plaintiffs notified the defendants for what purpose they designed the machinery, and the circumstances of their necessities, they might have brought forward other topics and elements of damage, such as they attempted to show on the trial,—that a large number of hands were, of necessity, under pay and idle, loss of promised custom, out of which profits would have ing a large credit business at Elliotts, South Carolina, installed a cotton ginny, so that they might not only make a direct profit from ginning cotton, but also facilitate their collections by having the first opportunity to purchase the cotton and cotton seed of their debtors. On April 12, 1906, the plaintiff, for, value, contracted to deliver to defendants one 12 by 14 Clarke engine on or before August 1, 1906, intended to furnish the power for defendants' ginny for the season of 1906. The ginning season begins about the middle of August. Though fully informed of the injury that would result to defendants' business from a delay in the delivery of the engine, yet plaintiff did not deliver it until about September 26, 1906. The specifications of damage are thus set out in the answer: "The defendants were unable to operate their said ginny for more than forty days of the best part of the cotton-ginning season of 1906, during which time a very large per cent of the cotton crop was ginned; that the money invested in their said cotton-ginning plant was idle and unproductive during said time; that, by reason of their inability to operate their said cotton ginny, they were caused to lose all of the large patronage, and the profits of the same which was previously theirs, which was assured them, and which they would have gotten, during said time, part of which profits they have never recovered; that a considerable part of said patronage was persons who owed accounts to defendants, and they were deprived of the first opportunity, and in many cases of any opportunity, to buy the cotton of such debtors, which caused considerable injury to their collections; that, by being thus thrown out of the first contract with a quantity of cotton and cotton seed which would have come to their ginny, as the same was prepared for market, they lost the purchase of the same and profits thereof; and that the good will of defendants' cotton-ginning business was greatly damaged and injured by reason of said delay,—all to the hurt, damage, and injury of the defendants in the sum of $1,995."

The circuit judge was undoubtedly right in holding the allegations of the counterclaim stated a cause of action for the rental value of the ginny plant, for the period that the plaintiff's delay in the delivery of the engine kept it idle. It is true, as plain-been made. In the absence of notice, proof of this kind was properly rejected. If, also, the plaintiff had alleged in his declaration, that he had made valuable contracts, to be executed with this machinery, which would have yielded him profits, the jury, though they would not be bound to adopt any specific contract that may have been made, yet, if reasonable evidence is given that the amount of profit would have been made, as claimed, the damages might be assessed accordingly."

In Stark v. Alford, 49 Tex. 260, it was held that the measure of damages in an action for the breach of a contract to deliver specified machinery necessary to the erection of a saw and grist mill is the difference in value between the machinery as furnished and as contracted for.

In Keystone Drilling Co. v. Stahl, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 498, it was held that the loss of future contracts for work as the result of a delay in the delivery of machinery wherewith to do such work is too speculative and remote to be recovered as damages.

In Bridges v. Lanham, 14 Neb. 369, 45 Am. Rep. 121, 15 N. W. 704, it was held that damages for the loss of the use of a corn-feed mill not in operation, but which was prevented from being built merely because of delay in the building of a stone flume, were too remote and uncertain, although the contractor for the construction of the flume knew of the intention to build.

In Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. 93, 12 Am. St. Rep. 299, 81 S. E. 644, it was held that the measure of damages for the failure to deliver the class of machinery contracted for, necessary to the opening of a cottonseed oil mill, and which resulted in the deterioration of a lot of cotton seed on hand, was the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the machinery supplied, also the difference between the value of the seed before it was damaged by the delay, and its value in its damaged condition; the court saying that the latter damages were not too remote and uncertain, and were within the contemplation of the parties.

In Cincinnati Chronicle Co. v. White Line Central Transit Co. 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 300, it was held that, for the delay in delivery of machinery necessary for the publishing of a newspaper, a carrier having notice of the purposes for which it is wanted is liable for the wages of the men while idle, the cost of efforts made to recover the machinery, as well as the cost of replacing it, made necessary by the delay.

Cases in which it appears that a contract has been made for the sale of all or part of the output of the plant, and which therefore seek to recover profits which might have been made from such contract, have been expressly excluded from this note.

For loss of rents as damages for breach of contract to install elevator or other equipment incidental to use of building, see case note to Winslow Elevator & Mach. Co. v. Hoffman, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1130.

For loss of profits on possible sales as measure of damages for breach of contract where no contingent sales have been effected, see case note to Winston Cigarette Mach. Co. v. Wells-Whitehead Tobacco Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255.

tiff contends, defendants cannot recover remote, contingent, or speculative damages based on profits they hoped to make. Harwood v. Tappan, 2 Speers, L. 536; Sitton v. Macdonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484; Mood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 40 S. C. 524, 19 S. E. 67; Colvin v. McCormick Cotton Oil Co. 66 S. C. 61, 44 S. E. 380; Hayes v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. C. 16, 67 L.R.A. 481, 106 Am. St. Rep. 731, 48 S. E. 608, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 424; Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500. But, if the defendants prove these allegations that the operation of the ginnery depended on plaintiff's delivery of the engine at the time agreed on, that this was fully explained to plaintiff when the contract was made, and that the failure of the plaintiff to comply with its contract prevented the operation of the ginnery, then there cannot be a doubt of the liability of the plaintiff for the direct damages which resulted from the ginnery plant being idle. These damages would be the value of the use of the plant for the period of inactivity due to plaintiff's delay in delivering the engine. The general rule, well supported by authority and the fairest that could be adopted, is that damages for the wrongful deprivation of the use of specific property are to be measured by its rental value. Harwood v. Tappan, supra; Martin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616; Cannon v. Hunt, 113 Ga. 501, 38 S. E. 983; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718; Brownell v. Chapman, 84 Iowa, 504, 35 Am. St. Rep. 326, 51 N. W. 249; Boyle v. Reeder, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 607; Williams v. Island City Mill Co. 25 Or. 573, 37 Pac. 49; Brown v. Pinch, 91 Mich. 156, 30 Am. St. Rep. 463, 51 N. W. 930; Korf v. Lull, 70 Ill. 420; Livermore Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Union Compress & Storage Co. 105 Tenn. 187, 53 L.R.A. 482, 58 S. W. 270.

This rule rests on the same reason as the rule that the measure of the vendee's damage for complete breach of the contract for the delivery of goods is the difference between the contract price and the market price. That reason is that things are worth what they will bring in the market, not what the party concerned may think they ought to bring; but, when, in breach of contract for the sale of goods by a final refusal to deliver, there is no market value by which the damages may be definitely ascertained, it would be unjust and absurd to say the recovery must be limited to nominal damages. The damages then, from the necessity of the case, must be ascertained by inquiry into the value of the article to the injured party. A familiar application of this rule is the allowance to a passenger of the value to him of baggage lost by a carrier. Turner v. Southern R. Co. 75 S. C. 58, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 188, 54 S. E. 825. Many other conditions to which the rule is applicable appear in the cases cited in note to Southern Exp. Co. v. Owens, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1148, and Todd v. Gamble, 148 N. Y. 382, 52 L.R.A. 227, 42 N. E. 982. In Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 670, 13 Eng. Ruling Cases, 558, the plaintiffs were under contract to deliver a certain machine by a certain time, and the defendants contracted with them to make a certain part of the machine called a gun. Owing to the delay of the defendants in making the gun, the plaintiffs were unable to comply with their contract and the machine was left on their hands. It was held the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from defendants the loss of their profit on the machine and their expenditures uselessly incurred in making other parts of the machine. So, also, damages for the temporary deprivation of specific property of another, due to a breach of contract, cannot be restricted to its rental value, where from any cause it has no rental value. In such cases the damages must necessarily be ascertained by an inquiry into the value of the use of the property to the injured party for the time he was deprived of it. Many cases might be cited illustrating this exception to the rule of rental value. A traveling salesman's sample trunks have no rental value; and hence, in Strange v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 77 S. C. 182, 57 S. E. 724, from necessity, the court laid down the rule that the measure of damages for breach of contract by delay in delivering such trunks, known to be essential to the salesman's business, was his fair average daily earnings. A like measure was adopted in Weston v. Boston & M. R. Co. 190 Mass. 298, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 569, 112 Am. St. Rep. 330, 76 N. E. 1050, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 825, to the delay in delivery of theatrical properties. Yet it is to be borne in mind the end courts always seek to attain is to give substantial and fair reparation to the injured party, and, at the same time, keep out of the administration of justice speculation and uncertainty. These ends are best attained by adhering to the market sale and rental value as closely as possible, and adopting other measures of damages only when necessity compels because there is no substantial market value.

There is a manifest difference between the interruption of an established manufacturing plant or other business, such as a cotton mill or flour mill, in successful operation, and the prevention of the establishment of a new business. It would, in most cases of the former kind, be exceedingly unjust to limit the award of damages to what the business would rent for, because there would ordinarily be no demand for the temporary use of the business which would express, even approximately, its value to the owner. The measure, then, must be the value of its use to the owner, to be ascertained by inquiry into its past results; and the most important factors in ascertaining such past results would be the usual profits earned. 3 Elliott, Ev. § 1904, and authorities there cited. "In Saluda Mfg. Co. v. Pennington, 2 Speers, L. 735, one of the questions was the measure of the damages for the interruption of a manufacturing business, due to defendant's failure to build a dam according to his contract. Plaintiff claimed large consequential damages. The proof was that the business, instead of being in successful operation, was a losing enterprise. For the interruption of the business the jury, in making up their verdict, allowed the company interest on the money invested in the plant, and the wages of the operatives for the time the mill was idle by reason of defendant's default. The plaintiff appealed, and the court held it had no reason to complain that the verdict was not larger. The defendant did not claim that the measure of damages should have been less than that allowed by the jury, but, on the contrary, acquiesced in the verdict. The case, therefore, is not authority for the proposition that, when a losing business is interrupted, the party responsible for the interruption must pay the interest on the investment and the wages of employees. It leaves undetermined the true measure of damages in such circumstances." When a business is in contemplation but not established, or not in actual operation, profit merely hoped for is too uncertain and conjectural to be considered. 1 Sedgw. Damages, 174. 189; note to Sitton v. MacDonald, 60 Am. Rep. 488; Williams v. Island City Mill Co. and Central Trust Co. v. Arctic Ice Mach. Mfg. Co. supra; Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co. 56 Kan. 614, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598, 44 Pac. 621; Fraser v. Echo Min. & Smelting Co. 9 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 28 S. W. 714; Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. supra; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wood, 189 Ill. 352, 59 N. E. 619; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Ragsdale, 46 Miss. 458; Rigney v. Monette, 47 La. Ann. 648, 17 So. 211.

A cotton ginnery is in operation during the harvest season only, and conditions are so liable to change from one season to another that the profit or loss of one season is only one of several factors in estimating the probable results of the next, and therefore 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

profit which the defendants hoped to make in the season of 1906 is too uncertain and speculative as the measure of damages. The advantage the ginnery was expected to give them in the buying of cotton and cotton seed and collecting accounts was still more contingent and speculative. It is quite possible to arrive at the fair rental value of a cotton ginnery for a cotton season. The business is simple, requiring little, if any, skilled labor. In making proof of the rental value of a ginnery which had been operated in past seasons, evidence may be offered not only of the cost and physical condition of the property, but of all the conditions which surround it, including its patronage, and success and hazards in the past, and any change for better or worse in such conditions. All of these, and perhaps other matters, would be inquired into by those contemplating the renting of the property, and they are therefore factors entering into the determination of the market rental value; but neither the past success indicated by the profits, nor any other single factor, is to be taken as controlling. Evidence of all these factors, along with other competent evidence, is admitted in order to arrive at the fair rental value. Lipscomb v. South Bound R. Co. 65 S. C. 148, 43 S. E. 388; Novelty Iron Works v. Capital City Oat-meal Co. 88 Iowa, 524, 55 N. W. 518; Leick v. Tritz, 94 Iowa, 322, 62 N. W. 855; Logemann v. Pauly, 100 Wis. 671, 76 N. W. 604; Nelson v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 41 Minn. 131, 42 N. W. 788; Mace v. Ramsey, 74 N. C. 11; Lavens v. Lieb, 12 App. Div. 487, 42 N. Y. Supp. 901; Williams v. Island City Mill Co. 25 Or. 573, 37 Pac. 49.

The answer states a good counterclaim for damages to be measured by the rental value of the ginnery from August 15 to September 26, 1906, the period alleged to have been lost by the plaintiff's breach of contract.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court overruling the demurrer be affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

ISAAC BORG, Appt.,
v.

SPOKANE TOILET SUPPLY COMPANY,
Respnt.

(50 Wash. 204, 96 Pac. 1037.)

Injury — pedestrian — collision with team — negligence.

A pedestrian who, upon stepping from the curb into the street for the purpose of crossing it, sees a delivery wagon apparently traveling near the opposite curb, and then proceeds on his way without paying any attention to his surroundings, is negligent, so that he cannot hold the owner of the wagon liable for injury caused by its collision with him through the horses crossing the street diagonally, because of inattention of the driver, whose view is obstructed by articles piled in front of him.

(August 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel R. Stern, for appellant:

The plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Messrs. Graves, Klizer, & Graves, for respondent:

Plaintiff's negligence in failing to exercise his senses precludes recovery.

Rudkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a colli-

Case Note. — Duty of pedestrian when crossing or traveling public street to avoid passing teams.

This note is confined to the question of the duty of a pedestrian to exercise care and caution, when crossing or traveling that portion of a public thoroughfare devoted to the use of vehicles, to avoid collision with passing teams; and excludes cases where one laboring in a public thoroughfare, or children playing therein, have been injured by passing teams, as well as injuries occasioned by street cars and motor vehicles.

It may be said that no general rule can be drawn from the cases as to what will or will not ordinarily constitute due care upon the part of a pedestrian to avoid injury from passing teams and vehicles while crossing or walking upon that portion of a public thoroughfare devoted to vehicles, as each case usually turns upon its own peculiar facts; which, it is generally held, must be submitted to the jury.

It is the general rule that the rights of a pedestrian at a crossing over a public street and those of the driver of a vehicle are reciprocal and equal, each being under an obligation to exercise ordinary care for his own safety and that of others, and the degree of care to be exercised must depend upon the particular facts in each case. Stanfield v. Anderson, 5 Ariz. 1. 43 Pac. 221; Coombs v. Purrington, 42 Me. 332; Stroub v. Meyer, 132 Mich. 75, 92 N. W. 779; McManus v. Woolverton, 47 N. Y. S. R. 107, 19 N. Y. Supp. 545, affirmed in 138 N. Y. 649, 34 N. E. 513, without opinion; Young v. Herrmann, 119 App. Div. 445, 104 N. Y. Supp. 72; Schwartz v. London, 90 N. Y. Supp. 449; Brooks v. Schwerin, 54 N. Y. 343; Reens v. Mail & Exp. Pub. Co. 10 Misc. 122, 30 N. Y. Supp. 913; Eckenberger v. Amend, 10 Misc. 145, 30 N. Y. 10 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Supp. 915, reversing 7 Misc. 452, 27 N. Y. Supp. 941; Myers v. Dixon, 3 Jones & S. 390; Lane v. Crombie, 12 Pick. 177; Eaton v. Cripps, 94 Iowa, 176, 62 N. W. 687; Simons v. Gaynor, 89 Ind. 165; Hoagland v. Canfield, 160 Fed. 146; Williams v. Richards, 3 Car. & K. 81; Cotton v. Wood, 8 C. B. N. S. 571.

It is for the jury to determine under all the circumstances of a case whether a pedestrian, in attempting to cross a public street, exercised ordinary care to avoid injury from passing teams. Schoeller v. Metropolitan Exp. Co. 108 App. Div. 226, 95 N. Y. Supp. 744; Rattagliata v. Hubbell, 7 Misc. 103, 27 N. Y. Supp. 409; Williams v. O'Keefe, 24 How. Pr. 16.

And this doctrine was applied where a pedestrian, while in a street awaiting the approach of a street car, was struck and killed by a vehicle following the car close beside the track. Deegan v. Cappel, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 603, 6 N. Y. Supp. 166.

Children.

It is necessary, in order to recover for injury sustained by a child five years and five months of age, by being run over while crossing a street to purchase candy, that the evidence disclose that he was in the exercise of due care. Clinton v. Boston Beer Co. 164 Mass. 514, 41 N. E. 1070.

As a child of tender years is expected to exercise only that degree of care, prudence, and foresight reasonably to be expected from such, it is for the jury to determine whether a ten or twelve year-old child exercised due care to avoid injury from passing teams while attempting to cross a public street. Johnson v. Kelleher, 155 Mass. 125, 29 N. E. 200.

The question of contributory negligence has been held to be for the jury under the following circumstances: Where a child of sion between the plaintiff and a laundry wagon driven by the defendant on one of the public streets of the city of Spokane. The answer denied the negligence charged in the complaint, and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. At the close of the trial the court submitted the following issues to the jury under instructions, to which no exceptions were taken: (1) Negligence on the part of the defendant; (2) contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and (3), conceding contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, did the defendant discover his peril in sufficient time to avoid injuring him, by the exercise of ordinary care? In addition to the general forms of verdict the court of its own motion submitted the following special findings or interrogatories to the jury: "(1) Was the plaintiff hit or kicked down by the defendant's wagon? (2) If you answer the above interrogatory in the affirmative, then state whether the driver saw the plaintiff before the wagon hit him. (3) If you answer the last interrogatory in the affirmative, then state whether the driver had sufficient time, after seeing plaintiff was in danger, to prevent the collision, if the driver had exercised reasonable care." The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, answered the first interrogatory in the affirmative, the second in the negaseven years was struck by a furiously driven team while she was crossing a public street. Dealey v. Muller, 149 Mass. 432, 21 N. E. 763.

Where a six-year-old child was returning home from school and, while "skipping" over a street crossing, was struck by a negligently driven team which she testified she did not see. Brown v. Sherer, 155 Mass. 83, 29 N. E. 50. The court said no high degree of care or caution could be expected of a child of that age.

Where a child six years and seven months of age, carrying two parcels, saw a vehicle 250 feet away when crossing a public street, and, while stooping to pick up one of the parcels she had dropped, was run over by it. Mattey v. Whittier Mach. Co. 140 Mass. 337, 4 N. E. 575.

Where a sixteen-year-old girl, before attempting to cross a street, looked both ways and saw a vehicle some distance away, and, when within 2 or 3 feet of the opposite curb, in response to a shout, turned and was struck by the horse which was beyond the driver's control and running at a high rate of speed, and, as she turned, it swerved from the middle of the street and struck her. Rush v. Joseph H. Bauland Co. 82 App. Div. 506, 81 N. Y. Supp. 830.

Whether a child of tender years should have looked both ways before venturing to cross a public street is a question for the jury. Moebus v. Herrmann, 108 N. Y. 349, 2 Am. St. Rep. 440, 15 N. E. 415; Gerber v. Boorstein, 113 App. Div. 808, 90 N. Y. Supp. 1091; Rottenberg v. Segelke, 6 Misc. 3, 25 N. Y. Supp. 997. affirmed without opinion in 148 N. Y. 734, 42 N. E. 725.

A child six years of age who, with many others who had just been dismissed from school, was struck by a rapidly driven vehicle while she was attempting to cross a street, is not guilty of contributory negligence where the driver thereof was looking backward at the time. Wikberg v. Olson Co. 138 Cal. 479, 71 Pac. 511. The court observed that it did not appear that the child saw the approaching vehicle, or, if she did, that she apprehended the danger; and, being of such a tender age, it could not be supposed she would use the caution exercised by an older person.

So the question of due care is held to be for the jury where a six-year-old child attempted to cross a public street just as a truck was approaching on the opposite side, and as he stepped from the curb the team suddenly swerved toward him, and although he attempted to regain the sidewalk he was struck by it. Elze v. Baumann, 2 Misc. 72, 21 N. Y. Supp. 782.

Or where a twelve-year-old boy before crossing a street saw a team approaching slowly in the middle of the block, and, as he was in the street, the driver whipped up his horses, which began to run, and the boy in running from them was struck and injured. Birnbaum v. Lord, 7 Misc. 493, 28 N. Y. Supp. 17, affirming 6 Misc. 535, 27 N. Y. Supp. 135.

So that question is for the jury where a thirteen-year-old boy, before attempting to cross a street, looked both ways and saw a wagon some distance away, which was being driven at a rapid rate, and there was nothing to obstruct the driver's view of the crossing. Streitfeld v. Shoemaker, 185 Pa. 265, 39 Atl. 967.

An adult with a babe in her arms and accompanied by two small children is not guilty of negligence which will be imputed to one of the children, where, after looking both ways, she started to cross a city street, observing only a vehicle on the opposite side some distance away, and one of the children who was a few feet in advance of her was struck by such vehicle, which, when 10 or 15 feet away, suddenly turned toward the child; as the adult cannot be said to be guilty of negligence in failing to anticipate a change of direction in which the vehicle was traveling, and the driver thereof being either drunk or guilty of inattention. Healey v. Ehret, 42 App. Div. 27, 58 N. Y. Supp. 917.

It is negligence in a child 5½ years old to start to run across a public street at a point other than an intersecting street, as directed by his mother, in face of an approaching vehicle which was driven in a careful manner, there being nothing to prevent the child seeing it, as it was within a few feet of him when he started to cross the street; as, under such circumstances, in no view of the case would a finding be warranted that the child exercised ordinary tive, and returned no answer to the third. The court thereafter gave judgment for the defendant notwithstanding the verdict for the plaintiff, and from this judgment the present appeal is prosecuted.

The facts in the case are very brief, and there is little or no conflict in the testimony. On the day of the accident an employee of the respondent was driving a laundry wagon to different points in the city of Spokane in the pursuit of his employer's business. He drove westerly along Sprague avenue to its intersection with Lincoln street, and turned northerly into Lincoln street along its westerly side. When he had proceeded about halfway across the block between Sprague avenue and Riverside avenue, he turned diagonally across the street from the west side to the east side, for the purpose of delivering some laundry at a barber shop. As the respondent's wagon was passing along the west side of Lincoln street in a northerly direction, the appellant stepped from the curb on the east side of the street, and started diagonally across the street to his place of business on the west side of the street. At or near the center of the street the appellant and the respondent's wagon or team collided while going at substantially right angles to each other, and the appellant received the injuries for which a recovery is here sought. The care. Hayes v. Norcross, 162 Mass. 546, 39 N. E. 282.

As to the general question of the contributory negligence of parent or custodian as a bar to action by child for negligent injury, see note to Chicago City R. Co. v. Wilcox, 21 L.R.A. 76, and case note to Neff v. Cameron, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 320.

And as to the contributory negligence of parent as a bar to an action by parent or administrator for death of child non sui juris, see case note to Vinnette v. Northern P. R. Co. 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328.

Persons of impaired faculties.

A person seventy-three years of age who is hard of hearing is bound to exercise ordinary care in attempting to cross a city street, such as a reasonably prudent man of his age and condition of hearing would be expected to exercise; and the fact of his deafness imposes upon him the duty of being more vigilant and cautious in the use of his other senses. Fennman v. Holden, 75 Md. 1, 22 Atl. 1049.

As it is not negligence under all circumstances for a blind person seventy-three years of age to walk the public streets unattended, he is bound to use only ordinary care to avoid passing teams; but, in determining what constitutes ordinary care, the jury are called upon to consider his blindness and other infirmities, and all the circumstances bearing upon the question as to what care was reasonably necessary to insure his safety. Neff v. Wellesley, 148 Mass. 487, 2 L.R.A. 500, 20 N. E. 111.

Duty to look and listen.

It is not the duty of a pedestrian to look and listen for approaching vehicles or teams before attempting to cross a public street; whether a failure so to do is negligence being a question for the jury. Murphy v. Armstrong Transfer Co. 167 Mass. 199, 45 N. E. 93; McDonald v. Bowditch (Mass.) 87 N. E. 585; Orr v. Garabold, 85 Ga. 373, 11 S. E. 778; Green v. Eden, 24 Ind. App. 583, 56 N. E. 240; Stringer v. Frost, 116 Ind. 477, 2 L.R.A. 614, 9 Am. St. Rep. 875, 19 N. E. 331; Sharpleigh v. Wyman, infra.

tempting to cross a street, to look both ways for approaching horses or vehicles, is not negligence as a matter of law; whether it is negligence being a question for the jury under all the circumstances of the case. Reens v. Mail & Exp. Pub. Co. 10 Misc. 122, 30 N. Y. Supp. 913, affirmed without opinion in 150 N. Y. 582, 44 N. E. 1128; Eckensberger v. Amend, 10 Misc. 145, 30 N. Y. Supp. 915, reversing 7 Misc. 452, 27 N. Y. Supp. 941; Eaton v. Cripps, 94 Iowa, 176, 62 N. W. 687; Dorr v. Schenck, 187 Mass. 542, 73 N. E. 532; Hickman v. Wm. Schimper & Co. 125 App. Div. 216, 109 N. Y. Supp. 325; McManus v. Woolverton, 47 N. Y. S. R. 107, 19 N. Y. Supp. 545, affirmed without opinion in 138 N. Y. 648, 34 N. E. 513.

But it was held in Barker v. Savage, 45 N. Y. 191, 6 Am. Rep. 66, that a nonsuit should be granted where a woman sixty-four years of age walking with a crutch attempted to cross a city street, looking straight ahead, and was struck by an approaching vehicle which she could have seen in time to avoid the danger had she looked. The court said it is not necessary to stop and listen before attempting to cross a city street where moving vehicles are numerous, but a failure to look in both directions is not an exercise of reasonable care.

So a pedestrian is guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, where, on a rainy day, while carrying an umbrella in a position which prevented his seeing an approaching team, without looking, he attempted to cross a public street. Dimuria v. Seattle Transfer Co. 50 Wash. 633, 97 Pac. 657. Following BORG v. SPOKANE TOILET SUPPLY CO.

Failure to discover approaching vehicle.

It is not negligence for a pedestrian to attempt to cross a street behind a high-loaded wagon before it has passed far enough to enable him to see that no other team is coming from behind it upon the opposite side. Purtell v. Jordan, 156 Mass. 573, 31 N. E. 652.

So one is not guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in failing to look up or down a street before attempting to cross it, and while crossing was struck street, but, upon hearing a noise which she thought was made by a street car, she started to run as fast as she could, and was struck by the vehicle which came up behind her.

It is not contributory negligence for a woman wearing a sunbonnet which obscured her vision, to cross diagonally a street intersection, where she was struck by a rapidly driven vehicle which approached from behind, and which, when she started to cross the street, was a considerable distance away. Shea v. Reems, 36 La. Ann. 966. The court said that there was no reason for her to anticipate that the vehicle would be driven so rapidly as to reach her, or so carelessly as to run over her, there being ample room for it to pass upon either side of her.

It is for the jury to determine whether one walking in the traveled portion of a street or highway is guilty of negligence in failing to look or listen for the approach of teams from behind. Wiel v. Wright, 29 N. Y. S. R. 763, 8 N. Y. Supp. 776.

So a pedestrian who left a sidewalk and walked in a street is not guilty of negligence per se which will defeat a recovery for being struck by a negligently driven vehicle which approached from behind, it being for the jury to determine whether under such circumstances he exercised ordinary care to avoid injury. Coombs v. Purrington, 42 Me. 332.

The fact that one traveling in a path in the snow near the beaten track did not turn out upon the approach from the rear of a sleigh driven at a great speed is not evidence of negligence as a matter of law, it being for the jury to determine whether the pedestrian was in the exercise of such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under similar circumstances. Kendall v. Kendall, 147 Mass. 482, 18 N. E. 233.

It was held error, in Stanfield v. Anderson, 5 Ariz. 1, 43 Pac. 221, to direct a verdict for the defendant where a pedestrian who was walking in the highway was struck by a rapidly driven horse which approached from behind over a soft piece of ground which was covered with straw to such an extent as to deaden the noise made by the horse.

So it is for the jury to determine whether one was negligent who, finding himself upon the wrong street car, jumped therefrom, dropping several bundles, and, while returning along the track to pick them up, did not look behind him, and was struck by a rapidly driven vehicle which came from his rear, although it was the only vehicle in sight. Undlejem v. Hastings, 38 Minn. 485, 38 N. W. 488.

Reliance upon presumption of exercise of due care by driver.

It is not negligence per se for a pedestrian who saw a rapidly driven vehicle approaching about 175 feet away upon an intersecting street, to cross a public street at a crossing, without again looking, where he was struck by it, as it was driven around the corner; the pedestrian testifying he supposed, from the rapidity with which the vehicle was driven, that it would continue a straight course and not attempt to turn a sharp corner, which presumption he was entitled to rely upon. Johnson v. Thomas (Cal.) 43 Pac. 578.

And this doctrine has been applied where a woman, on a rainy evening, started from the curb to board a street car at a point in a busy city street where the stores and street were lighted, and was struck by a horse and wagon driven at a rate of 6 miles an hour, the approach of which she might have seen had she looked; as she was entitled to presume that a vehicle approaching such a place would do so at a reasonable rate of speed. Stroub v. Meyer, 132 Mich. 75, 92 N. W. 779. For a similar decision see Thompson v. Keyes-Marshall Bros. Liv- erty Co. 214 Mo. 487, 113 S. W. 1128.

So, one is not guilty of contributory negligence where, before attempting to cross a street, he saw a team approaching 100 or 200 feet away, and then, looking straight ahead, started across the street diagonally; as he might rightfully assume that the driver would exercise due care, and, when the vehicle was such a distance, he would be warranted in attempting to cross the street. Cherbuliez v. Parsons, 59 Misc. 613, 111 N. Y. Supp. 516.

So where the jury may infer that the driver of a vehicle might have controlled his team, which was driven at an immoderate rate of speed, if it had not been so driven, a pedestrian will not be negligent in attempting to cross a city street, where he was struck by the rearing horse, which became frightened at a passing elevated train and swerved and struck the pedestrian as he was near the opposite curb; as he might rightfully assume that the driver would approach with that degree of care which the law imposed upon him. Van Houten v. Fleischman, 1 Misc. 130, 20 N. Y. Supp. 643, affirmed without opinion in 142 N. Y. 624, 37 N. E. 565.

Subsequent negligence of driver.

It is not contributory negligence for a pedestrian to fail to observe an approaching vehicle, there being nothing to obstruct his view, where the driver of the vehicle did not check the speed thereof at a point where pedestrians were to be expected. Mordente v. New York Cab Co. 109 N. Y. Supp. 12.

So a pedestrian who was crossing a street at a point other than the usual crossing may recover damages, although guilty of some negligence, if the driver of the vehicle which struck him, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have seen and avoided the pedestrian. Springett v. Ball, 4 Fost. & F. 472.

So a case is properly submitted to the jury, where a pedestrian, without looking in either direction, attempted to cross a street and was struck by a negligently driven vehicle, although he failed to exercise ordinary care, if the driver thereof could have discovered the peril of the pedestrian in time to avoid injuring him. Dieter v. Zbaren, 81 Mo. App. 612. McDonald v. Bowditch (Mass.) 87 N. E. 585.

It is not negligence per se for a woman, with a shawl over her head, on a rainy day, who looked both ways, to attempt to cross a street at a point other than a cross walk, where, when halfway across, she again looked and was knocked down by a vehicle, the driver of which might have avoided striking her by the exercise of ordinary care. McManus v. Woolverton, 47 N. Y. S. R. 107, 19 N. Y. Supp. 545, affirmed without opinion in 138 N. Y. 648, 34 N. E. 513.

So one seventy-two years of age is not negligent, as a matter of law, where, before attempting to cross a street, he looked both ways and saw only a sleigh some distance away, and thought he had time to cross, and was struck by it when close to the opposite curb, there being ample room for the driver of the sleigh to have avoided striking him. McCrohan v. Davison, 187 Mass. 466, 73 N. E. 553.

So a pedestrian is not guilty of negligence, as a matter of law, where he attempts to cross a street, seeing an approaching vehicle and constantly watching the same, and when almost across the street is struck by the vehicle which has been continuously driven toward him at a rapid rate; it being a question for the jury, as the driver of the vehicle might have seen the pedestrian in time to avoid injuring him. Schwartz v. London, 90 N. Y. Supp. 449.

So it is for the jury to determine whether due care was exercised by one who had been drinking in a saloon, and stepped into a street in the nighttime to take a street car, and was struck by a passing vehicle while he was standing where the light from the saloon windows and a street lamp made him plainly visible to the driver. Meyer v. Lewis, 43 Mo. App. 417.

As to the duty of pedestrians in a public street to look out for, and avoid, automobiles, see subject note to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 215, and case note Hennessey v. Taylor, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 345.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

FRANK MANTEUFEL, Respt.,

v.

GUSTAV WETZEL, Appt.

(133 Wis. 619, 114 N. W. 91.)

Surface water — gathering in ditch.

An upper landowner is not liable for collecting in a ditch following the course of the usual flow of surface water, the surface water which formerly spread over the surface, and hastening its flow onto the land of the lower proprietor.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Waupaca County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to require defendant to close a drainage ditch and for damages. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion. ,
Messrs. Eberlein & Eberlein for appellant.

Messrs. Olen & Olen for respondent.

Timlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Only one question is necessary to be considered. It is established by the findings that the parties own adjoining lands. There is on the defendant's land and about 700 feet west of the plaintiff's land a sink hole, or depression, which in wet seasons and before the construction of the ancient ditch contained about 3 acres of water of the average depth of 1½ feet, and between this sink hole or depression and the land of the plaintiff there is upon the land of the defendant at a point distant from the common boundary an elevation of about 3

Case Note. — Right to hasten flow of surface water along natural drain ways.

This note does not cover the rights with respect to surface water in a diffused state having no outlet through natural drain ways or depressions; nor does it include cases which turn upon statutory or contractual rights, or rights acquired by prescription. The general subject as to the rights with respect to the flow of surface water is treated in the note to Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L.R.A. 593.

The principle very generally accepted by the courts, that the owner of higher land may not concentrate at one point surface water diffused over the surface, and discharge it in a mass upon the lower land, does not apply to natural depressions or drain ways through which the surface water on the higher land drains onto the lower land. On the contrary, it is established by the great weight of authority that the flow of surface water along such depressions or drain ways may be hastened and incidentally increased by artificial means so long as the water is not diverted from its natural flow. Wilson v. Bondurant, 142 Ill. 645, 32 N. E. 498; Lambert v. Alcorn, 144 Ill. 313, 21 L.R.A. 611, 33 N. E. 53; Ribordy v. Murray, 177 Ill. 134, 52 N. E. 325; Broadwell Special Drainage Dist. No. 1 v. Lawrence, 231 Ill. 86, 83 N. E. 104; Throop v. Griffin, 77 Ill. App. 505; Lattimore v. Davis, 14 La. 163, 33 Am. Dec. 581; Sowers v. Shiff, 15 La. Ann. 300; Ludeling v. Stubbs, 34 La. Ann. 935; Guesnard v. Bird, 33 La. Ann. 796; Rhoads v. Davidheiser, 133 Pa. 226, 19 Am. St. Rep. 630, 19 Atl. 400; Shaw v. Ward, 131 Wis. 648, 111 N. W. 671, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1139.

This rule with its limitations is well feet. More than twenty years prior to the commencement of this action, the predecessor in title of the defendant cut through this elevation by a ditch, so that the surface water which formerly collected in such depression passed through said ditch and to a point upon defendant's land about 150 feet west of the common boundary, where it spread over defendant's land and escaped by the natural course of surface water onto the land of the plaintiff. The said sink hole or depression is a natural basin or reservoir without natural outlet, which is capable of holding, and which, in fact, did collect, receive, and hold, large quantities of surface water which fell and gathered upon lands of the defendant and adjacent land in the vicinity of said depression; and the surface water so collected remained standing in said depression until the same disappeared by evaporation, absorption by the earth, or was removed therefrom by means of said ancient ditch or artificial outlet to the point aforesaid upon the defendant's land. In May, 1904, the defendant, following the natural course of the surface water, excavated on his own land a shallow ditch from the termination of said ancient ditch to the common boundary between plaintiff and defendant; and, as a direct result thereof, the surface water from said depression has passed through the ancient ditch and through the extension thereof just mentioned to the plaintiff's land, and has been deposited on the plaintiff's land in greater quantities and with much greater rapidity stated in the following language from the opinion in Dayton v. Drainage Comrs. 128 Ill. 271, 21 N. E. 198 (and quoted with approval in Lambert v. Alcorn, supra): "The rule undoubtedly is that the owner of a higher tract of land has the right to have the surface water falling or naturally coming upon his premises by rains or melting snow pass off through the natural drains upon or over the lower or servient lands next adjoining; and the owner of the dominant heritage has the right, by ditches and drains, to drain his own land into the channels which nature has provided, even if the quantity of water in that way thrown upon the next adjoining lower lands is thereby increased. But the owner of the higher lands has no right to open or remove natural barriers, and let on to such lower lands waters which would not otherwise naturally flow in that direction."

This right of the owner of the higher land to hasten and incidentally increase the drainage through natural depressions or drain ways is most frequently applied where the purpose is the improvement of agriculture; but the right to hasten the drainage in this manner has also been upheld for the purpose of benefiting a railroad right of way. Jenkins v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 110 N. C. 438, 15 S. E. 193; Staton v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 111 N. C. 278, 17 L.R.A. 838, 16 S. E. 181; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bishop (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 323.

And the doctrine was applied in favor of a street railway company in Whitney v. Willamette Bridge R. Co. 23 Or. 188, 31 Pac. 472. But see Frisbie v. Cowen, infra.

So, the doctrine applies in favor of a municipal corporation for the purpose of carrying off surface water, but not for purposes of sewerage. Robb v. LaGrange, 158 Ill. 21, 42 N. E. 77. The latter branch of the proposition is supported by Van Rensselaer v. Albany, 15 Abb. N. C. 457.

As subsequently shown, there is some conflict as to whether this doctrine permits the drainage of ponds; but it is clear that the mere fact that, because of the drainage, some stagnant water disappears, will not 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

render the drainage unlawful. Peck v. Herrington, 109 Ill. 611, 50 Am. Rep. 627; Lambert v. Alcorn, 144 Ill. 313, 21 L.R.A. 611, 33 N. E. 53.

In the exercise of this right to hasten the flow of surface water along natural depressions or drain ways, the owner of upper land may construct ditches and underground drains so long as he does not divert water from its natural flow. Lambert v. Alcorn; Peck v. Herrington and Robb v. La Grange, —supra; Helm v. Richmond, 72 Ill. App. 516; Bickel v. Martin, 115 Ill. App. 367; Vannest v. Fleming, 79 Iowa, 638, 8 L.R.A. 277, 18 Am. St. Rep. 387, 44 N. W. 906; Sheker v. Machovec (Iowa) 110 N. W. 1055; Dorr v. Simmerson, 127 Iowa, 551, 103 N. W. 806; Hull v. Harker, 130 Iowa, 190, 106 N. W. 629; Meixell v. Morgan, 149 Pa. 415, 34 Am. St. Rep. 614, 24 Atl. 216.

So the owner of the lower land cannot complain of the plowing of blind furrows on the higher land along the course of a natural depression or drain way, or of the leaving of an opening or culvert in a wall for the passage of the water, although the result is that the water is contracted to a smaller compass, and discharged with slightly increased velocity. Peck v. Goodberlett, 109 N. Y. 180, 16 N. E. 350. The court in this case, however, commented on the fact that there was no substantial damage to the lower proprietor.

And in Daum v. Cooper, 103 Ill. App. 4, it was said, in effect, that the manner in which one conducts surface water over his land before it reaches another's land is a matter of no concern to the latter so long as it reaches his land in the same course in which in a state of nature, it was accustomed to flow.

But in Templeton v. Voshloe, 72 Ind. 134, 37 Am. Rep. 150, it was held that the right of an owner of an upper field to make drains on his own land is restricted to such as are required by good husbandry and the proper improvement of the surface, and as may be discharged in the natural channels without, inflicting palpable and unnecessary injury on the lower field of an adjacent owner.

And the right thus to ditch higher lands and force than before, and has thereby rendered about 4 or 5 acres of the plaintiff's land too wet for ordinary use as agricultural land, and of less value than formerly, and, in the year 1904, caused a washout upon the lands of the plaintiff of about 45 feet in length by 7 feet in width, and 3 feet in depth. Upon these facts, the court below held that the ancient ditch extending from the sink hole or depression on defendant's land to a point on defendant's land about 150 feet from the common boundary should be allowed to be and remain as it was, apparently upon the ground that this outlet had been maintained more than twenty years prior to the commencement of the action. That ruling is not excepted to, and is not before us for review. But the court decreed on these facts that the plaintiff recover $100, and that the defendant be ordered to close and fill up the extension of ditch above described, made by him in May, 1904, and thereafter to keep the same closed.

We have considered the cases (Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 223, 3 Am. Rep. 50; Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656, 9 Am. Rep. 473; Fryer v. Warne, 29 Wis. 511; *O'Connor v. Fond du Lac, A. & P. R. so as to drain them through natural depressions or drain ways is declared in Hughes v. Anderson, 68 Ala. 280, 44 Am. Rep. 147, to be subject to the condition that it is done with prudent regard to the welfare of the owner of the lower land, the question of the respective rights of the parties to be determined with proper reference to the value and necessity of the improvement to the superior heritage, contrasted with the injury to the inferior.

As shown in the above quotation from Dayton v. Drainage Comrs. supra, the rule under discussion which permits the hastening of the flow of water along natural channels does not permit the opening or removal of natural barriers so as to drain off surface water which would not otherwise naturally flow in that direction.

This limitation of the rule is also applied, or at least recognized, in the following cases: Humphreys v. Moulton, 1 Cal. App. 257, 81 Pac. 1085; Mellor v. Pilgrim, 7 Ill. App. 306; Crossville v. Stuart, 77 Ill. App. 513; Stinson v. Fishel, 93 Iowa, 656, 61 N. W. 1063; Geneser v. Healy, 124 Iowa, 310, 100 N. W. 66; Dorr v. Simmerson, 127 Iowa, 551, 103 N. W. 806; Finkbinder v. Ernst, 126 Mich. 565, 85 N. W. 1127; Delahousaye v. Judice, 13 La. Ann. 587, 71 Am. Dec. 521; Barrow v. Landry, 15 La. Ann. 681, 77 Am. Dec. 199; Jeffers v. Morgan, 149 Pa. 415, 34 Am. St. Rep. 614, 24 Atl. 216.

So, a railroad company has no right to utilize a gully or depression for the purpose of carrying off surface water collected from points beyond the natural drainage district of such gully or depression. Frisbie v. Cowen, 18 App. D. C. 381.

Ponds and marshes.

The general rule, which obtains in the absence of statutory, contractual, or prescriptive rights, that water collecting in ponds, marshes, or sloughs, cannot be drained upon the lower land of other owners to the substantial detriment of the latter, has been frequently applied to ponds, marshes, or sloughs fed from surface water. See Crabtree v. Baker, 75 Ala. 91, 51 Am. Rep. 424; Hicks v. Silliman, 93 Ill. 255; Gregory v. Bush, 64 Mich. 37, 8 Am. St. Rep. 797, 31 N. W. 90; Yerex v. Eineder, 86 Mich. 24, 24 Am. St. Rep. 113, 48 N. The foregoing cases, however, did not present the question as to the right to cut through natural barriers or construct artificial ditches for the purpose of drawing off the water from such ponds, marshes, or sloughs through natural depressions or ravines in the direction of the natural flow of the water.

It has been frequently held, however, that such ponds, marshes, or sloughs cannot, by cutting through natural barriers or digging artificial ditches, be drained into natural ravines or depressions where the drainage or flow of the water in a natural state is in another direction. Anderson v. Henderson, 124 Ill. 164, 16 N. E. 232; Bischmann v. Bochl, 30 Ill. App. 455; Dayton v. Drainage Comrs. 128 Ill. 271, 21 N. E. 198; Nye v. Kahlow, 98 Minn. 81, 107 N. W. 733; *Erhard v. W. 671), and do here determine that, where the upper proprietor does no more than collect in a ditch, which ditch follows the course of the usual flow of surface water, the surface water which formerly took the same course toward the land of the lower adjacent proprietor, and causes to pass through this ditch the surface water which formerly took the same course but spread out over the surface, he has committed no actionable legal wrong of which the lower proprietor can complain, or upon which such lower proprietor can maintain an action. In other words, causing surface water to flow in its natural direction through a ditch on one's own land, instead of over the surface or by percolation as formerly, where no new watershed is tapped by said ditch and no addition to the former volume of surface water is caused thereby, except the mere carrying in a ditch what formerly reached the same point on defendant's land over a wider surface by percolation through the soil, or by flowing over such wider surface, is not, when not negligently done, a wrongful or unlawful act. It follows that, upon the findings of fact of the court below, the conclusion of law should have been that the defendant was entitled to judgment dismissing the complaint and judgment accordingly.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant dismissing the plaintiff's complaint.

outlet cannot be lawfully drained by artificial means into a natural slough or "bayou" through which it runs onto the lower land of an adjoining proprietor.

And in Butler v. Peck, 16 Ohio St. 334, 88 Am. Dec. 452, it was distinctly held that the owner of land having upon it a marshy sink or basin of water cannot lawfully pierce the rim so as to draw off water which otherwise would have no outlet, into a natural swale or depression through which it finds its way onto lower land; and that the result is not affected by the fact that in times of high water a portion of the waters of the basin would overflow its rim and find its way through the swale upon the lower land.

The tendency of the later cases, however, is to permit the piercing of a natural barrier so as to permit the water from such a pond, marsh, or slough to run off through a natural depression or ravine, or to suffer the deepening of the natural outlet, so long as the water is not diverted from its natural course.

Thus, it was held in Sheehan v. Flynn, 59 Minn. 436, 26 L.R.A. 632, 61 N. W. 462, that the owner of land upon which there was a depression covering about 20 acres, in which, during the wet season, water accumulated, and stood until it had evaporated or been absorbed by the soil, might drain the same by connecting it, by an artificial ditch 96 rods long, with the head of a ravine which crossed other ground and emptied into a lake, notwithstanding that at times the water in the lake was thereby raised so as to cover an acre or two of another person's land which would not otherwise be submerged. The court emphasized the fact that the method of drainage adopted was the only available one, and that the consequent injury to others as compared to the benefit to be derived from the improvement was not so great as to make it unreasonable.

In the last case the court called attention to the fact that the so-called pond or lake was merely a large marsh in which surface water collected at certain seasons of the year and mostly disappeared at others, and intimated that the rule might not apply to all lakes or ponds fed by surface waters; and the case of Krupke v. Stockard, 103 Minn. 349, 115 N. W. 175, was taken out of the rule upon the express ground that, though the pond or slough in that case was maintained solely by the accumulation of surface water, it was of a permanent character, and, hence the water therein had lost its character as surface water.

The doctrine of Sheehan v. Flynn was applied in Gilfillan v. Schmidt, 64 Minn. 29, 31 L.R.A. 547, 58 Am. St. Rep. 515, 66 N. W. 126, by holding that the owner of land upon which there was a pond or marsh having a natural outlet, whence in wet seasons its waters flowed through a fairly well-defined channel or water way across another's land, was entitled to deepen the natural outlet on his own land, although the result was to drain off waters from the pond or marsh which otherwise would not escape, but remain stagnant until evaporated or absorbed; and that he was not liable for damages to the other party's land by the overflow of the water from such outlet at a time of a very heavy rainfall, even assuming that the overflow was caused by the deepening of the natural outlet, and the consequent increase of the drainage. Start, Ch. J., and Buck, J., concurred in the decision upon the ground that the evidence failed to show that the deepening of the ditch was the proximate cause of the overflow which injured the plaintiff's land, and dissented from so much of the opinion as approved of the doctrine of Sheehan v. Flynn.

So, the owner of land upon which there is a pond in which is collected the surface water from rains and melting snow may, when good husbandry requires, drain the same by an artificial drain constructed upon his own land, whereby the water is thrown into the same outlet or natural drain it was accustomed to take before when the pond was full, notwithstanding that the flow of water over a servient tract of land may thereby be increased. Peck v. Herrington, 109 Ill. 611, 50 Am. Rep. 627; Highway Comrs. v. Whitsitt, 15 Ill. App. 318.

In Graham v. Keene, 143 Ill. 425, 32 N. E. 180, it was held the public, represented by the highway commissioners, had a right to have the surface water falling or coming naturally upon the highway pass off the same through the natural and usual channel or outlet, and to construct ditches or drains for the purpose of conducting the surface water, and the water in a pond on the highway, into such natural and usual channel or outlet, even if the water carried upon the lower lands was thereby increased; but that they had no right to cut through a natural ridge so as to drain the water of a pond into a channel which was not its natural outlet.

The owner of higher land has a legal right to rid his lands of surface water as it comes thereon from any source, by permitting or causing the same, by such means as may be reasonably necessary, to flow in the natural course of drainage to and onto adjoining lands, though the same may, by natural, or by artificial, means for which he is not responsible, reach and spread out over another's lands. Shaw v. Ward, 131 Wis. 646, 111 N. W. 671, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1139. The court said: "No reason is perceived why respondents could not rightfully have filled up the depression on their lands, preventing the water from accumulating thereon and causing it to pass on to the east and reach appellants' lands by way of the ditch, or to have at any time opened the basin into the draw, or a ditch if necessary, to the east, and emptied the reservoir, being responsible, if at all, for the damages thus caused to others, but not for damages caused by the improvement preventing surface water from subsequently being retained on their lands, or, at a time when the pond had disappeared by evaporation and absorption, have opened the basin towards the natural draw so as to prevent a future accumulation."

So, an owner of land has the right, in the interests of good husbandry, to drain ponds or basins thereon of a temporary character and which have no natural outlet or course of flow, by discharging the waters thereof by means of an artificial channel into a natural surface-water drain on his own property, and through such drain over the lands of another proprietor in the general course of drainage in that locality, even though the flow in such natural drain is thereby increased over the lower estate; provided this is done in a reasonable and careful manner and without negligence. Aldritt v. Fleischauer, 74 Neb. 66, 70 L.R.A. 301, 103 N. W. 1084; Todd v. York County, 72 Neb. 207, 66 L.R.A. 561, 100 N. W. 299; Arthur v. Glover (Neb.) 118 N. W. 111.

vec (Iowa) 110 N. W. 1055, the court declared that the owner of land upon which there is a pond or swale has the right to conduct the water therefrom into natural drainage channels, and through such channels to cast it upon the lower land; provided that the water so thrown upon the lower land is not materially and unduly increased to the injury of the owner thereof. But, upon a subsequent appeal in this case (116 N. W. 1042) the jury having found that the drain was not in the general course of natural drainage, the defendant was held liable. The court pointed out that the rule that, to sustain a recovery by the owner of the lower land, the flow must have been substantially increased, was confined to cases where the drainage was in the natural course of drainage.

The bed of a pond and sink hole may be filled up so as to prevent the water from accumulating in them, although the result is to hasten the flow along its natural course. Gregory v. Bush, 64 Mich. 37, 8 Am. St. Rep. 797, 31 N. W. 90; Yerex v. Eineder, 86 Mich. 24, 24 Am. St. Rep. 113, 48 N. W. 875; Osten v. Jerome, 93 Mich. 196, 53 N. W. 7; Launstein v. Launstein, 150 Mich. 524, 121 Am. St. Rep. 635, 114 N. W. 383.

An upper owner will not be enjoined from cutting ditches to drain sloughs upon his land through a swale onto lower land, if, because of the ditches, the absorptive power of the land will be so much increased that the quantity of water flowing through the swale will not be greater than before. Cooper v. Bartholomew (Iowa) 75 N. W. 1134.

parochial school building, where a building owned by it is wholly inadequate to its needs.

(November 27, 1098.)

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a sectarian school and to compel a restoration of moneys expended for that purpose. Affirmed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

The defendant school district, for a period of about twenty years, rented from the defendant congregation of the Immaculate Conception, a Roman Catholic church corporation, certain rooms in its school building, and expended the school moneys of the district in paying teachers to conduct schools therein, and also paid certain small amounts for fuel, cleaning, and the like. The building had been erected for the purposes of a parochial school by said church corporation, and the rest of the rooms therein not rented by the district were used to maintain the parochial school, and the public school conducted in the rooms rented by the school district was characterized by certain religious ceremonies, in that certain distinctive prayers of the Catholic Church were said at intervals throughout the school day, church hymns were sung, and the teachers were nuns specially designated to the service by the superior of a Catholic sisterhood to which they belonged. In addition, the scholars, prior to school hours, quite uniformly attended distinctively religious teaching in the adjoining church, and the school was suspended to enable their attendance upon weddings and funerals in the church. The pupils were all children of Catholic parents, members of the church congregation, with occasional exceptions of one or two at various times during said twenty years. The plaintiffs, members of the congregation, but also residents and taxpayers of the district, on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated, brought this action to enjoin the school board and district from persisting in maintaining the public school of the district in such manner and from paying out any moneys of the district for such purposes, and also to recover in behalf of the district all sums paid for maintenance of such school from the said church corporation and from the members of the school board who had joined in paying it out. The trial court found that the school so conducted had at all times been pervaded and characterized by sectarian instruction contrary to law, and granted injunction against continued maintenance thereof, but held that it was within the power of the school district and board to rent rooms as they deemed wise for the maintenance of a distinctively public school and therefore refused to enjoin the maintenance thereof in the parochial school building. With regard to the moneys expended prior to the commencement of the suit, he held that the plaintiffs and all members of the school district had at all times had full knowledge, both before and immediately after the fact, of the manner in which the school was conducted, and of the expenditure of the school-district moneys for the purposes aforesaid, and that, having made no objection, they were guilty of laches such as to warrant the court in denying the prayer for the repayment of moneys expended for services rendered in good faith and with the tacit approval and acquiescence of all interested parties. The plaintiffs appeal from those parts of the judgment which deny injunction against maintenance of a public school in the parochial school building, and deny recovery from the church corporation and from the members of the school board of the moneys paid out for teachers' salaries and other expenses of the school maintained heretofore.

Messrs. Cady, Strehlow, & Jaseph, for appellants:

Taxpayers may maintain an action under proper circumstances to compel public officials and third parties to repay into the public treasury money paid out illegally.

which at all resembles the foregoing case; but the facts clearly distinguish it. Here a recovery was allowed; but the action was brought by a taxpayer in his own behalf to recover back taxes paid for the support of a sectarian institution, while in DORNER v. SCHOOL DIST. No. 5 the action was brought by taxpayers of a school district for the benefit of the district. In the former case the decision would turn generally upon the principles of recovery of erroneous taxes, while in the DORNER CASE it would appear that other principles would apply.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

But two questions arise upon this appeal, and they rather narrow ones. The very important questions as to what acts may constitute the giving or allowing sectarian instruction such as is prohibited in public schools by article 10, § 3, Wis. Const. and whether the acts done in the instant case are within that inhibition, are treated in an able and exhaustive opinion by the trial court, but are not presented by the appeal. We are therefore to start with the fact that for nearly twenty years the school officers have annually paid school-district moneys for support of a school where sectarian instruction was permitted. The question whether such payments were so unlawful L.R.A.(N.S.)

ful that the school district, as a corporation, might maintain an action at law to recover them back from the recipients, or for damages against the district officers and their confederates for dissipating the school funds, was not decided, but affirmative answer was hypothetically assumed by the trial court, as also that the district will not bring any such action. The right of a member of a corporation to invoke the interference of a court of equity to practically coerce the reluctant corporation to enforce its legal rights against its officers and their confederates is abundantly established by our decisions. Frederick v. Douglas County, 96 Wis. 411, 71 N. W. 798; Webster v. Douglas County, 102 Wis. 181, 72 Am. St. Rep. 870, 77 N. W. 885, 78 N. W. 451; Northern Trust Co. v. Snyder, 113 Wis. 518, 90 Am. St. Rep. 867, 89 N. W. 460. But, since the application must be to a court of equity, equitable considerations will guide and control in granting or withholding relief. The court will not coerce the enforcement of a strict legal right, however clear, if thereby injustice and inequity will be done. In development of this rule it is well settled that a court of equity may and should refuse to upset consummated and completed transactions to the hurt of those who have acted in good faith at the suit of plaintiffs who, by laches or failure to protest upon opportunity before the acts were done, have induced or justified belief that they acquiesced in and approved such acts. Helms v. McFadden, 18 Wis. 192; Cross v. Bowker, 102 Wis. 497, 78 N. W. 564; Frederick v. Douglas County, 96 Wis. 425, 71 N. W. 798; McCann v. Welch, 106 Wis. 142, 151, 81 N. W. 996. This rule was applied by the circuit court, who found as facts that plaintiffs and all other taxpayers had been cognizant of the manner of conducting the school, and that the electors of the district each year had been informed that the money had been spent for such purpose, and, without protest from any, at each meeting directed like expenditures for the ensuing year. Such finding is not antagonized by any clear preponderance of evidence. On the faith of such acquiescence, believing that all taxpayers approved, the defendant officers have parted with the money, and, quite obviously, must lose it if compelled to reimburse the district. These plaintiffs at least cannot equitably ask that the defendants so suffer for acts induced and invited by plaintiffs' own conduct.

2. We find no error in the trial court's refusal to enjoin the district and board from maintaining a common school in the parochial school building. Incidentally, it may be noted that there is no prayer for such specific relief; but the court considered the Equity — construction of will — jurisdiction.

A court of chancery will refuse to entertain a bill merely to construe a will in which no trust is involved.

(October 26, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for St. Francis County in complainants' favor in a suit for the construction of a will. Reversed.

Statement by HILL, Ch. J.:

John H. Frank was a resident of Memphis, Tennessee, and died there on October 6, 1904, leaving a will containing six paragraphs. The first paragraph provides for the payment of his debts; the second is a devise of his residence to two of his daughters and one of his sons; the third provides a legacy of $1,000 for a grandson. The fourth is as follows: "I hereby give, devise and bequeath to my seven children and legal heirs, to wit, Chas. F., Robt. B., John L., Walter A., Clara M., Elizabeth G. and Leonora F. Frank, now Mrs. S. A. Bowen, all my property, real, personal and mixed, wheresoever situated, not already disposed of, which I now own or may hereafter acquire and of which I may die seized and possessed, absolutely and in fee simple and in equal shares. The division shall be made by three commissioners to be appointed by my said children, and the lots and parcels of land so divided shall be drawn for by them and any difference in the valuation be settled among themselves. The property of my daughters, however, shall be held and owned by them for their sole and separate use and enjoyment, free from the debts and contracts of any husbands, for and during their natural lives with remainder in fee to their children, and in default of children surviving either of them, then to my children who shall then be living, their heirs and assigns forever; and should any of my sons die without issue, his or their shares shall also revert to my children then living, their heirs and assigns forever." The fifth paragraph is a provision that no lawyers' fees or court costs whatever be charged to his estate, and any heir desiring to employ an attorney should do so at his own individual expense. The sixth appointed three executors, and made provision for choosing their successors. Mr. Frank owned large tracts of land in Lee, Crittenden, and St. Francis counties, Arkansas. He left seven children surviving him. The children were all adults, and there were eight grandchildren, all of whom were minors. His children filed suit in the chancery court of St. Francis county against the grandchildren and the executors, seeking a construction of the will. They set forth the ownership of the land in said county, and other counties in Arkansas, by Mr. Frank at his death, the execution of his will and its due probate in Shelby county, Tennessee, the names and residences of his children and grandchildren, and of the executors of the will, and that duly authenticated copies of the will had been filed with the clerk of each of said counties, and had been duly admitted to probate by the probate courts of Lee, Crittenden, and St. Francis counties; and set forth that the executors had duly qualified in the state of Tennessee, and are proceeding with the administration of said estate in the state of Tennessee, and have paid, or will pay, all of the debts and liabilities of every character, and have ample personal assets for that purpose, so that the said executors have not and will not qualify in the state of Arkansas, as there is no occasion for their doing so. And they further alleged that the legacy given by the said will to the grandson had been paid, or would be paid, by the executors in Tennessee, and there is no necessity or occasion for taking such legacy into account for the purposes of this suit. They further alleged that a suit had been brought and is now pending in the chancery court of Shelby county, Tennessee, for a construction of the will of said John F. Frank, and that such court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the executors named in said will, and that the children of said Frank are the plaintiffs, and his grandchildren are the defendants, therein, and that said suit will be finally settled and determined with reference to the real estate located in the state of Tennessee, and all the personal property wheresoever situated; but that said court has no jurisdiction to establish the title to the lands in Arkansas; and, for that reason, this suit was brought for the purpose of obtaining a construction and interpretation of the titles derived by the parties to the suit to the lands devised by the fourth paragraph of the will. The plaintiffs alleged that, by a proper construction and interpretation of the said fourth paragraph, the testator had attempted to limit a

remainder in the lands upon a previous gift or devise thereof to the plaintiffs, respectively, in fee simple and equally, and charged that, under the laws of Arkansas, it was not lawful to dispose of the fee in said lands, and then to create and limit a remainder upon such fee, and then to control and circumscribe the disposition of the fee, as was attempted in the will; and they allege that the plaintiffs take an absolute fee-simple title, and that the remainders and cross remainders to the children of the testator, or his grandchildren or descendants, as therein provided, are void and without effect. But they allege that, in consequence of the probate of the will, and because it disposes of all the said lands and contains provisions as above stated, it is necessary, in order that the titles of the plaintiffs may not be encumbered and embarrassed, and that they may be able to hold, use, enjoy, and dispose of their lands according to their title and rights under the laws, that the court should put a construction and an interpretation upon the fourth paragraph of said will, and ascertain and declare and decree the legal effect thereof, so that the titles and rights of the parties may be fixed and established, and that it may be known just what they are, and just what can be relied upon by all persons having occasion to deal with the same. It was prayed that the defendants be brought in under proper process, and guardians ad litem appointed for the minors, they having no regular guardians, and that the court put a proper construction and interpretation upon every part of the will, particularly the fourth paragraph; ascertain and fix the rights of the plaintiffs and defendants in the lands, which were described at length in the complaint, and their shares therein, and that the same be declared vested in the plaintiffs in fee equally, share and share alike, and not subject to the remainders and provisions of the said fourth clause of the will limiting their titles and rights, and restricting and circumscribing their powers of disposition, and that such provisions be declared and decreed to be of no force and effect. The minor defendants were all brought properly into court, and filed answer through their guardian ad litem, taking issue with the construction which the plaintiffs placed upon the will, and denying that the plaintiffs became seised in the fee simple of the real estate, and asserted that the proper construction of the fourth paragraph of the will was to devise the real estate to the plaintiffs for their natural lives, with a remainder in fee to the children of said plaintiffs; and they asked that the court place such construction upon the will. The defendants also filed a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. This demurrer does not appear to have been acted upon by the court. Testimony was taken, which only went to prove the children and grandchildren left by Mr. Frank at the time of his death, and the pendency of the suit in Tennessee, and other matters of fact alleged in the complaint. It was proved that all of the indebtedness of the estate had been discharged. The executors made no answer to the complaint, and accepted service of notice to take depositions. The case was heard on the complaint and its exhibits, and the answer of the infant defendants by their guardian ad litem, the evidence of service showing that the nonresident defendants were properly summoned, and the will and the depositions. The court construed the will as prayed in the complaint. The infant defendants, by their guardian ad litem, excepted to the same, and took an appeal.

Mr. John Gatling for appellants.

Messrs. W. M. Randolph, George Randolph, and Wassell Randolph for appellees.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court: .

As will be seen by reference to the statement of facts, this is a bill brought by the children of John F. Frank to obtain a construction of the fourth paragraph of his will; the children maintaining that thereunder they obtained a fee-simple title to the lands devised in said paragraph, and the answer of the guardian ad litem of the grandchildren maintaining that the children obtained a life estate, with a vested remainder in the grandchildren. There is no trust involved, no trust estate is created, and the executors are not seeking aid or instruction in the discharge of their duties. The indebtedness of the estate has been paid. The sole question sought to be determined is the title conveyed to the respective parties to this suit under the fourth clause of the will. No controversy has arisen over it, the object of the suit appears to be to prevent, rather than to settle, a controversy. There are no equitable titles or trusts created by the will. The titles conferred by the fourth paragraph—whatever they may be—are purely legal and capable of assertion in a court of law. Has a chancery court jurisdiction to entertain this suit? Mr. Pomeroy says: "Although there is not an entire uniformity in the decisions by courts of different states upon this particular subject, yet the doctrine which seems to be both in harmony with principle and sustained by the weight of authority is that the special equitable jurisdiction to construe wills is simply an incident of the general jurisdiction over trusts; that a court of equity will never entertain a suit brought solely for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of a will, without any further relief, and will never exercise a power to interpret a will which only deals with and disposes of purely legal estates or interests, and which makes no attempt to create any trust relations with respect to the property donated." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 1156. This statement was quoted and followed in Head v. Phillips, 70 Ark. 432, 68 S. W. 878, and an examination of the authorities proves it to be sound: The same principle is thus stated in the Encyclopædia of Pleading & Practice: "In fact, by the great preponderance of authority, the power of courts of equity to construe wills is simply an incident of their general jurisdiction over trusts; and, while such power will be exercised liberally on behalf of executors, trustees, or other persons interested in trusts created by wills, suits brought solely for the construction of wills, where no trust is involved, will not be entertained." 22 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1191. The court of appeals of New York said: "It is by reason of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery over trusts that courts having equity powers as an incident of that jurisdiction take cognizance of, and pass upon, the interpretation of wills. They do not take jurisdiction of actions brought solely for the construction of instruments of that character, or when only legal rights are in controversy." Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 221. In Bailey v. Briggs, 56 N. Y. 407, it is thus expressed: "It is when the court is moved in behalf of an executor, trustee, or cestui que trust, and to insure a correct administration of the power conferred by a will, that jurisdiction is had to give a construction to a doubtful or disputed clause in a will. The jurisdiction is incidental to that over trusts." The Illinois court said: "Where no trust is created, the law, as we understand it, is that neither the executor nor the heir or the devisee who claims only a legal title in the estate will be permitted to come into a court of equity for the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of the provisions of the will." Strubher v. Belsey, 79 Ill. 307. This case was followed and reiterated in Harrison v. Owsley, 172 Ill. 629, 50 N. E. 227. Mansfield v. Mansfield, 203 Ill. 92, 67 N. E. 497, is strikingly similar to the case at bar. The lower court had given judgment on titles derived from a will at the instance of an heir, where no trust was involved, and the supreme court declined to pass upon the will, and dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

although the jurisdiction had not been questioned. The following cases have also been examined, and found to contain the same principle, in many of which there are reviews of the authorities on the subject: Woodlief v. Merritt, 96 N. C. 226, 2 S. E. 350; Dill v. Wisner, 88 N. Y. 153; Torrey v. Torrey, 55 N. J. Eq. 410, 36 Atl. 1084; Fahy v. Fahy, 58 N. J. Eq. 210, 42 Atl. 726; Kelley v. Kelley, 80 Wis. 486, 50 N. W. 334; Mansfield v. Mansfield, 203 Ill. 92, 67 N. E. 497; Miller v. Drane, 100 Wis. 1, 75 N. W. 413. This court reached the same conclusion in Head v. Phillips, supra. A demurrer was interposed in the chancery court, which does not seem to have been passed upon; but it raised the question of jurisdiction. Kelley v. Kelley, supra. Even without the demurrer, however, the court should have declined to pass upon the issue tendered, as it is not the subject-matter of jurisdiction of the chancery court, and consent cannot give such jurisdiction. Mansfield v. Mansfield, supra; Richards v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 Ill. 517, 16 N. E. 909.

In view of these authorities and many more which may be found cited by the text writers and reviewed in the cases mentioned, it was unquestionably the duty of the chancery court to refuse to entertain the bill; and, for the error in entertaining it and rendering a decree construing the will, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill without prejudice to any future litigation which may arise between the parties.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

BARBARA E. BROWN, Exrx., etc., of John A. Brown, Deceased, et al., Appts.,
v.

TOWN OF SEBASTOPOL, Resp't.

(153 Cal. 704, 96 Pac. 363.)

Executor — presentation of claim — conveyance of property.

1. Presentation of a claim as a creditor of the estate is not a condition to the main-

Case Note — Necessity in a complaint for specific performance of alleging facts showing adequacy of consideration for contract sought to be enforced.

Where a party is seeking to enforce in equity the specific performance of a contract, there must be an allegation of facts which affirmatively show the adequacy of consideration. A mere statement of the price agreed to be paid is not enough. There must be a showing of the value, so that the court can determine whether or tenance of an action to compel a conveyance by the executor of one holding a legal title of land, the title to which, in equity and good conscience, should be conveyed to complainant.

Pleading — specific performance — sufficiency of allegations.

2. A complaint to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land is not demurrable for failure to present facts which will enable the court to say that the consideration is adequate, where it specifically alleges the adequacy of the consideration.

Specific performance — consideration — services.

3. Specific performance of a contract to convey land will not be denied because the consideration was services to be rendered by the grantees, if they have been fully performed.

Same — source of consideration.

4. The right of a town to specific performance of a contract to convey land to it in consideration of its opening and constructing a road through other property of the grantor without expense to him is not affected by the fact that some of the money for the construction of the road was gathered by private subscription, and did not all come from the public treasury.

Contract — town — proceeds.

5. The right of a town to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey property to it in consideration of its opening a street is not affected by a finding that the agreement was made with members of the board of township trustees, if they were acting for the town.

Specific performance — town.

6. An incorporated town having charter authority to purchase real estate may compel specific performance of a parol agreement to convey to it real estate in consideration of its opening a road through remaining property of the grantor, after not it is in reasonable proportion to the price to be paid, or of other facts which are sufficient to satisfy the court that the contract is just and reasonable to the buyer. White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689; Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 57 Pac. 386; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 231; Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148; Waymire v. Waymire, 141 Ind. 164, 40 N. E. 523; Mayger v. Cruse, 5 Mont. 485, 6 Pac. 333. See also Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 346.

In an action for the specific performance of a contract to convey land, where facts are set out which show that acts of the plaintiff in carrying out the contract are an adequate consideration, there need be no specific averment as to value of the land or the adequacy of the consideration. The court distinguishes Windsor v. Miner, supra, on the ground that the contract in that case was executory. Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 261, 67 Pac. 276.

In Tumlinson v. York, 20 Tex. 694, a complaint was held insufficient because there was "no allegation that a valuable consideration was paid." The necessity of such an allegation was deemed an "essential fact," although there was no question of what must be shown as to the adequacy of the consideration.

Where an agreement acknowledging a consideration is made a part of a complaint for specific performance, it is not necessary, as far as the consideration is concerned, to allege any additional fact in order to perfect the pleading. Younger v. Welch, 22 Tex. 418.

The consideration for the agreement is one of the things which "must be clearly and definitely alleged" to make a petition for specific performance a sufficient pleading. Jones v. Jones, 49 Tex. 683.

An allegation "that the consideration which the said plaintiff was to pay to the said defendant and which the said defendant was to receive from the said plaintiff for the lands herein described was adequate in amount and not disproportionate to the value of said lands" was held sufficient in Kerr v. Moore (Cal. App.) 92 Pac. 107; the court taking the view that to allege that the consideration "was adequate in amount" would hardly meet the requirement, but that the additional "not disproportionate to the value" was but another way of saying "equal in value," and that this was sufficient to make the complaint good.

Where a contract containing a recitation that it was executed "for valuable consideration" is made a part of a petition for specific performance, there is a sufficient allegation of a consideration to support the petition. Byars v. Thompson, 80 Tex. 468, 15 S. W. 1087.

Treating an injunction bill as a suit for specific performance, Gaskins v. Peebles, 44 Tex. 390, refused to grant the relief sought, because "the facts relied upon, the consideration for the agreement, the time when it was entered into, its terms and stipulations, are all so vaguely and indefinitely presented in the petition."

It was held in Davenport v. Plano Implement Co. 70 Ill. App. 161, that, in an action to compel a corporation to issue a certificate for certain shares of its stock, it was not necessary to allege the actual cash value of the property transferred in payment for the stock, where the averments of the bill particularized what the property was, that it was inspected by a committee of the corporation and had been retained and used in the business of the corporation, and that the transfer was authorized by the directors.

A general allegation that a contract was founded on a valuable consideration is sufficient in an action for specific performance, to sustain the petition as against a general demurrer. Pattillo v. Jones, 113 Ga. 330, 38 S. E. 745.

it has fully performed its agreement and been let into possession, and the former owner has disclaimed further interest in the property and been relieved from taxation on it on that account.

Appeal — favorable ruling.

7. A person cannot complain of a favorable amendment, pending appeal, of a judgment which inadvertently failed to afford him relief to which he was entitled.

(June 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sonoma County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a motion for new trial in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. K. Dougherty, for appellants:

The facts alleged will not enable the court to say that the consideration is adequate, and do not present a case for the interposition of a court of equity.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sued to quiet title (with other lands) to a triangular piece of land situate within the corporate limits of the defendant town of Sebastopol, alleging title and right of possession in her testator. Defendant pleaded by way of answer and cross complaint, in the cross complaint alleging that during his lifetime John A. Brown, plaintiff's testator, entered into a contract whereby he agreed to sell and convey to the defendant town the real property in controversy, upon consideration expressed as follows: "That defendant would remove from said premises certain houses, buildings, and structures then located thereon belonging to said John A. Brown, and place said houses, buildings, and structures upon other lands belonging to said John A. Brown, and would lay out, make, and put in condition for use a street along and across the lands of said John A. Brown, . . . and would lay out, open up, make, and put in condition for use Depot street in front of and adjacent to the premises hereinbefore described, and would grade and put oil on that portion of said Depot street in front of and adjacent to the said premises hereinbefore described, and in front of other lands and premises belonging to said John A. Brown, and that defendant would pay to said John A. Brown the sum of $50 when the said Depot street had been oiled as hereinbefore alleged." The complaint further alleged the performance, by defendant, of all the acts to be by it done, that defendant entered into possession of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

disputed land with the acquiescence of Brown, and ever since has continued in such possession, and that, upon the death of Brown, $50 was tendered to the executrix of his will, with the request that a deed be executed in conformity with the agreement; that the tender was refused, and the right to a deed denied. It is then alleged that the services rendered and the sum agreed to be paid for the premises was and is a just, fair, and adequate consideration and price for the land therein described. Issue was joined upon this cross complaint, and a trial resulted in findings and judgment for the defendant. From this judgment, and from the order of the court denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

A demurrer to the cross complaint was interposed, upon the ground that it failed to state sufficient facts, in this, that there was an absence of an allegation of a presentation of a claim against the estate. But it is apparent from the cross complaint that it is an action in equity, to enforce a trust as to specific real property; that plaintiffs hold legal title to a piece of land, which legal title, in equity and good conscience, they should be compelled to convey to defendant. It is well settled that, where recovery is sought of specific property alleged to have been held in trust by the decedent at the time of his death, a party seeking such recovery is not asking payment of the claim from the assets of the estate, and is therefore not required to present his claim as a creditor of the estate. Byrne v. McGrath, 130 Cal. 316, 80 Am. St. Rep. 127, 62 Pac. 559; Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861; Re Dutard, 147 Cal. 256, 81 Pac. 519. Appellants further contend that the complaint fails to present facts that will enable the court to say that the consideration is adequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable as to the plaintiffs. But the complaint specifically alleges the fairness of the contract and the adequacy of the consideration, and is not obnoxious to demurrer upon this ground. It is again urged that there is no mutuality of remedy, because the contract could not be enforced against the town. Civil Code, § 3386. While it is true that a part of the consideration moving from the defendant was in the nature of personal service, and therefore not specifically enforceable, yet the situation here pleaded is that expressly contemplated by § 3386, where the defendant has fully performed, in which case it is well settled that the obligation, if in other respects specifically enforceable, may be enforced in specie against the party in default. It is so held in that class of cases where the consideration is, upon the one side, purely personal and in the nature of personal services.

poration. Where particular powers are expressly conferred, and there is also a general grant of power, such general grant by intendment includes all powers that are fairly within the terms of the grant, and are essential to the purposes of the municipality, and not in conflict with the particular powers conferred. The law does not expressly grant powers and impliedly grant other powers to conflict therewith.

Same — particular powers.

5. If reasonable doubt exists as to a particular power of a municipality, it should be resolved against the city; but, when the particular power is clearly conferred, or is fairly included in or inferable from other powers expressly conferred, and is consistent with the purposes of the municipality and the powers expressly conferred, the existence of the power should be resolved in favor of the city, so as to enable it to perform its proper functions of government.

Same — implied power — water supply.

6. Authority to make provisions within lawful limitations, for securing or furnishing to a city and its inhabitants an abundant supply of good water for all purposes, is a usual and necessary power of a municipality, and such power may be included in powers given in general terms; where there is nothing in the enumeration of particular powers conferred to limit in this particular the operation of the general powers conferred.

Same — powers — exercise — discretion.

7. Unless expressly or impliedly restrained by statute, a municipal corporation has a discretion in the choice of means and methods for exercising the powers given it for governmental or public purposes, and the usual limitations upon the actions of municipalities within their legal powers are good faith and reasonableness, not wisdom or perfection.

acquire by purchase an existing system of waterworks constructed by private parties.

So, in Austin v. Bartholomew, 46 C. C. A. 327, 107 Fed. 349 (writ of certiorari denied in 183 U. S. 698, 46 L. ed. 395, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934), it was held that a city could rent hydrants of a water company for municipal purposes, where its charter authorized it to construct waterworks, to provide the city with water, to erect hydrants, etc.

So, in Springville v. Fullmer, 7 Utah, 450, 27 Pac. 577, it was held that a city could take possession and control of the waters of a certain stream, with the express consent of the original locators and owners thereof, and continue to hold possession of the same and distribute its waters, where its charter granted it the right to furnish water, lay pipes, etc., for the extinguishment of fires and the convenience of the inhabitants.

And in the following cases it was held that a municipality had the right to provide for a supply of water by contract with third persons, under charter provi-

Same — court interference.

8. When action is taken by a municipality in the exercise of its powers, the methods used will not be controlled by the courts, where there is no abuse of power or discretion. All doubts as to the propriety of means used in the exercise of an undoubted municipal power will be resolved in favor of the municipality.

Same — powers — general — particular — limitation.

9. The authority given a municipality in the general law "to make and sink wells, erect pumps, dig drains," etc., is distinct from, and does not limit or qualify, the express particular authority "to pass all laws necessary to guard against fire," or the charter power "to provide for the establishment of waterworks," nor limit the powers given by the general clauses conferring powers upon the municipality.

Same — taxing power — limitation — water contract.

10. The limitations upon the taxing and bonding powers of the city of Tampa, contained in the charter act and the General Statutes of the state, do not preclude the city from granting privileges in its streets, or from making valid contracts by ordinance to carry out a lawful purpose of the municipality in procuring for the city and its inhabitants an adequate supply of good water for all purposes.

Same — water supply — method — discretion.

11. Where a city is authorized to provide for the establishment of waterworks, and to do and regulate any other matter or thing that may tend to promote the peace, health, welfare, prosperity, and morals of the city, and to do and perform all acts necessary and best adapted to the improvement and general interest of the city, the method used by the city in providing waterworks sions empowering the city to enact such laws and ordinances as it might deem expedient for the peace, good government, health, and welfare of its inhabitants: Greenville v. Greenville Waterworks Co. 125 Ala. 625, 27 So. 764; Dyer v. Newport, 123 Ky. 203, 94 S. W. 25; Webb City & C. Waterworks Co. v. Webb City, 78 Mo. App. 422.

On the other hand, in National Foundry & Pipe Works v. Oconto Water Co. 52 Fed. 29, it was held that such general-welfare clause of a city charter gave the city no power to confer a franchise for owning and operating waterworks, where the city had never adopted the general law authorizing municipalities to legislate in regard to the construction and operation of waterworks. But this decision was reversed in 10 C. C. A. 60, 18 U. S. App. 458, 24 U. S. App. 81, 61 Fed. 782, because the city's charter gave it the express power to provide for the erection of waterworks, which provision it was said was "apparently not brought to the attention of the court below."

for the city is within the lawful discretion of the city, if no particular method is indicated by the law.

Same — private plant.

12. The powers of the city of Tampa in providing waterworks for the city and its inhabitants are not limited to the establishment of a municipal plant, and the city has authority to confer upon a corporation proper privileges and franchises in the use of the streets of the city to enable the corporation to furnish an adequate supply of good water for all purposes to the city and its inhabitants.

Same — ordinances — illegal provisions.

13. An ordinance of a city containing provisions sufficient of themselves to accomplish an expressed lawful purpose, the fact that the ordinance also contains separable illegal or improper provisions will not necessarily render the ordinance void in toto, when the elimination of the illegal portions will not cause results not intended, or affect the integrity of the remaining portions for the purposes expressed.

Contracts — statutory provisions.

14. Provisions of law applicable to the subject-matter of contracts are parts of the contracts, whether so expressed or referred to in the contracts, or not.

Same — public service — regulation.

15. Where the law authorizes the regulation of service rendered the public, such law becomes a part of and controls contracts providing for the public service.

Same — unenforceable provisions.

16. Where a municipal contract for the rendering of public service contains provisions that would be unenforceable because unreasonable, and the law provides for the regulation of the service rendered under the contract, such right to regulate may relieve the apparent unreasonable features of the contract.

Same — provisions sustained.

17. Municipal contracts for the rendering of public service will be sustained where the power is given to make the contract, and the terms of it, taken with the law controlling them, are not clearly violative of some provision or principle of law.

Municipal corporation — water supply — streets — exclusive use.

18. The powers conferred upon the city of Tampa by its charter and the general law do not authorize the city to grant an exclusive privilege to use the streets of the city for the purpose of furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants.

Same — capacity — rates.

19. Provisions contained in an ordinance of the city of Tampa relating to rates to be charged and to the capacity of a waterworks plant authorized in the streets should be construed as having reference to the expressed design to furnish an adequate supply of good water for all purposes, and to the governmental authority to regulate such matters as they affect the rights of the public.

Ordinances — partial validity.

20. As the expressed purpose of the Tampa municipal-ordinance contract for the furnishing of water to the city and its inhabitants can be accomplished by its valid portions, and the elimination of invalid or improper portions does not injure the city, it cannot be said that it appears the ordinance would not have been passed without the invalid portions, or that an elimination of the invalid portions would cause results not intended by the ordinance.

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto to test the right of the respondent to exercise the privileges and franchises of using the public streets of the city of Tampa for the maintenance of a system of waterworks. Demurrer to the return overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. R. Gunby and Glen & Himes for relator.

Mr. P. O. Knight, for respondent:

The city of Tampa had power to enter into a contract for the establishment of a waterworks system.

Even if the franchise is invalid because by ordinance the city undertook to invest the company with exclusive rights in the city for a period of years, it would in no wise affect the validity of the contract.

Bartholomew v. Austin and Little Falls Electric & Water Co. v. Little Falls, supra; 2 Abbott, Mun. Corp. pp. 1152-1154.

Messrs. Sparkman & Carter also for respondent.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In quo warranto proceedings instituted here by the attorney general against the Tampa Waterworks Company, a corporation, it is alleged that the company is exercising, without any warrant or authority of law, the privileges and franchises of using the public streets of the city of Tampa for stated purposes of a system of waterworks. A writ was issued by this court requiring the Tampa Waterworks Company "to show by what warrant or authority it has used and does use the privileges and franchises aforesaid, to wit, that of using the public streets of the city of Tampa by maintaining and operating a system of pipes, mains, and hydrants therein for the distribution and supply of water to the city of Tampa and the inhabitants thereof for public and private uses, and that of having an exclusive right to furnish water within the city of Tampa to the said city and the inhabitants thereof."

The return of the respondent sets up facts to show its claim of right to use the franchises and privileges alleged, and avers that while, under its charter and articles of incorporation, it was granted by the state of Florida the exclusive right for twenty years from the date on which it commenced successful operation of its waterworks in the streets of Tampa, yet the respondent expressly denies that it has ever exercised, claimed, asserted, or usurped any exclusive right to furnish water within the city of Tampa to said city and the inhabitants thereof. The cause is considered upon a demurrer to the return.

The writ is issued against the Tampa Waterworks Company as a corporation, and it does not directly question the right of the respondent to exist as a corporate entity. The mandate does not call for a showing as to the right to exist as a corporation, but it requires the respondent only to show by what warrant or authority it has used and does use the privilege and franchise in the public streets as alleged. This being so, it is not necessary to consider the questions raised by the relator as to the constitutionality of the general incorporation acts of 1868 (chapter 1639, p. 118, Laws of Florida), under which the respondent claims to have obtained its charter to exist and do business as a corporation.

Articles of incorporation obtained under the general law authorizing the corporation to engage in the business of rendering public service in a municipality do not ipso facto authorize the corporation to use privileges and franchises that may be conferred by the municipality to render the public service therein.

As the right to exist as a corporation and to do the kind of business alleged are not questioned, the existence of proper authority from the city of Tampa to the corporation to exercise the privilege and franchise of using the streets as alleged is to be determined. The question is the existence of authority, not the proper exercise of it.

Municipalities are established by law for purposes of government. Their functions are performed through appropriate officers and agents, and they can exercise only such powers as are legally conferred by express provisions of law, or such as are by fair implication and intentment properly incident to or included in the powers expressly conferred for the purpose of carrying out and accomplishing the object of the municipality. Powers that are indispensable to the declared objects and purposes of a municipality may be inferred or implied from powers expressly given that are fairly subject to such construction. The difficulty of making specific enumeration of all such powers as the legislature may intend to delegate to municipal corporations renders it necessary to confer some power in general terms. The general powers given are intended to confer other powers than those specifically enumerated. General powers given to a municipality should be interpreted and construed with reference to the purposes of the incorporation. Where particular powers are expressly conferred, and there is also a general grant of power, such general grant by intentment includes all powers that are fairly within the terms of the grant, and are essential to the purposes of the municipality, and not in conflict with the particular powers expressly conferred. The law does not expressly grant powers and impliedly grant others in conflict therewith. If reasonable doubt exists as to a particular power of a municipality; it should be resolved against the city; but, where the particular power is clearly conferred, or is fairly included in or inferable from other powers expressly conferred, and is consistent with the purposes of the municipality and the powers expressly conferred, the existence of the power should be resolved in favor of the city, so as to enable it to perform its proper functions of government.

Among the usual functions of a municipal government are those of granting privileges in the use of its streets for the purpose of rendering services of a public nature, such as furnishing the municipality and its inhabitants service necessary or useful for the common welfare of all. The furnishing of water for use and for free protection is a service necessary or useful for the individual and collective well-being of a city and its inhabitants. Authority to make provisions within lawful limitations for securing or furnishing to a city and its inhabitants an abundant supply of good water for all purposes is a usual and necessary power of a municipality; and such power may be included in powers given in general terms, where there is nothing in the enumeration of particular powers conferred to limit in this particular the operation of the general powers conferred. Porter v. Vinzant, 49 Fla. 213, 111 Am. St. Rep. 93, 38 So. 607; Mernaugh v. Orlando, 41 Fla. 433, 27 So. 34.

Unless expressly or impliedly restrained by statute, a municipal corporation has a discretion in the choice of means and methods for exercising the powers given to it for governmental or public purposes, and the usual limitations upon the actions of municipalities within their legal powers are good faith and reasonableness, not wisdom or perfection: Jacksonville Electric Light Co. v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 229, text, 271, 30 L.R.A. 540, 51 Am. St. Rep. 24, 18 So. 677.

Where action is taken by a municipality in the exercise of its powers, the methods used will not be controlled by the courts, where there is no abuse of power or discretion. All doubts as to the propriety of means used in the exercise of an undoubted municipal power will be resolved in favor of the municipality.

In its return the respondent exhibits an ordinance contract, approved September 29, 1887, between the city of Tampa and the Tampa Waterworks Company, containing provisions "that, in view of the urgent necessity for the better protection against fire, and also to obtain for the use of the inhabitants of said city an abundant supply of good water for all purposes, . . . the exclusive right and privileges to construct, maintain, and operate waterworks for public and private supply of water within said city for a term of thirty years is hereby granted, . . . together with the right to lay pipes, erect hydrants, fountains, and such other structures and appurtenances in any and all the streets or other public ways in the said city as may be required for the distribution of water;" that, in consideration of $4,950 per annum, the company agreed to erect waterworks with a reservoir capable of holding 100,000 gallons of water of sufficient height to give a stated pressure at a given point in the city, to supply with water for fire purposes, mains, etc., as designated, to supply with water, for the payment of city taxes and license for the first ten years of the contract, the city hall, guardhouse, and market house, with designated accommodations at such places on the mains as designated by the city council; that a sufficient tax shall be levied and collected annually upon all taxable property of the city to meet the payments due under the contract as they respectively mature; that the main or pipe system shall be laid in such streets as shall give the greatest amount of fire protection and the distribution of an adequate amount of water to the consumers; that the company shall, in accordance with the contract set out in the ordinance, extend the water mains to any part of the said city, when ordered to do so by the proper authorities of the city of Tampa: that there shall be annually levied and collected a tax of five mills on the property in the city for the payment of the obligations of the contract. Other provisions of the ordinance contract need not be stated here.

Chapter 3779, which became effective June 2, 1887, and established the city of Tampa, provides, in § 7 (Laws 1887, p. 193), that the "city council shall have power to make, ordain, establish, and execute for the government of said city such ordinances . . . as they shall deem necessary, . . . to provide for the establishment of waterworks, . . . and to do and regulate any other matter or thing that may tend to promote the peace, health, welfare, prosperity, and morals of the said city; and . . . said city council shall have all the powers and perform all the duties imposed upon them by the laws of Florida . . . providing for the creation and government of cities and towns."

Under the general laws of the state, the city council had the power "to levy and collect a special tax annually for waterworks and fire protection" (Acts 1885, p. 46, chap. 3605, § 1); "to pass all laws and ordinances which may be necessary for the preservation of the public health; to make and sink wells, erect pumps, dig drains; to pass all necessary laws to guard against fire; . . . and to do and perform all such other act or acts as shall seem necessary and best adapted to the improvement and general interest of the city" (McClellan's Dig. 1881, chap. 37, §§ 20, 21, p. 249).

It is contended that these provisions of law did not authorize the city of Tampa to make the contract with the respondent. The argument is that the furnishing of water by a municipal plant was contemplated, because the general law authorized the city council "to make and sink wells, erect pumps, dig drains," issue bonds for building or repairing the public works of the city, and levy a special tax for waterworks and fire protection; because the city charter empowered the city council, by ordinance, "to provide for the establishment of waterworks" and to impose fines and penalties for breaches of ordinances; because limitations were placed upon the power to borrow money and issue bonds, and to make appropriations, and enabling legislation was enacted; and because of the provisions as to the related powers given by the charter and by the general law, and the limitations contained in § 8 of article 8 of the Constitution.

The authority contained in the general law "to make and sink wells, erect pumps, dig drains," etc., is distinct from, and does not limit or qualify, the express particular authority "to pass all laws necessary to guard against fire," or the charter power "to provide for the establishment of waterworks." Nor does the express specific authority as to wells, pumps, and drains limit the powers given under the general-welfare clauses. No such purpose can be discovered in a careful consideration of all the provisions of law on the subject of the municipal powers. Any provision made by the city must be by ordinance, and cities are authorized to contract by ordinance, as well as to erect their own plants by ordinance and to perform other duties by ordinance.

The limitations upon the taxing powers of the city, contained in the charter act or in the General Statutes of the state, do not preclude the city from granting privileges in its streets or from making valid contracts by ordinance to carry out any lawful purpose of the municipality.

The powers given as to taxation and appropriations are as applicable to the obligations of lawful contracts as to municipal plants. Powers and limitations as to bonds for public works of the city do not forbid the making of valid contracts for lawful purposes. The method by which waterworks are to be provided is not indicated in the law, and the city may exercise a lawful discretion in using the charter powers "to provide for the establishment of waterworks . . . and to do and regulate any other matter or thing that may tend to promote the peace, health, welfare, prosperity, and morals of the said city," and the powers given by the general law to do and perform all acts necessary and best adapted to the improvement and general interest of the city.

The powers given the city council are not expressly or by fair implication limited to the establishment of a municipal plant for the purpose of conserving the public health, safety, and general welfare, by providing water for the city and its inhabitants. It was clearly within the power of the city, under the provisions of law herein referred to, to make a valid contract with a private corporation "to obtain for the use of the inhabitants of said city an abundant supply of good water for all purposes," and to confer upon the corporation proper privileges and franchises in the use of the streets of the city to enable the company to properly render the public service provided for.

Under the express authority given the city council of the city of Tampa by the charter act "to provide for the establishing of waterworks," and to "have all the powers and perform all the duties imposed upon them by the laws of Florida . . . providing for the creation and government of cities," taken in connection with the powers given by the general law on the subject "to levy and collect a special tax annually for waterworks and fire protection, . . . to pass all laws and ordinances which may be necessary for the preservation of the public health. . . . to make and sink wells, erect pumps, and dig drains, to pass all necessary laws to guard against fire, . . . and to do and perform all such other act or acts as shall seem necessary and best adapted to the improvement and general interest of the city," and construed with reference to the principle that, while municipalities can exercise only such powers as are given expressly or by necessary or fair implication from those expressly given, yet such municipalities are given all the powers that are incident to and by implication are fairly included in powers expressly given and that are necessary to the purposes of their creation, it is clear that the usual and essential authority to make provision for an adequate supply of good water for the use of the city and its inhabitants is included in the powers conferred upon and the duties imposed upon the city of Tampa when the contract was made. It is also clear that the city had the choice of means for securing such supply of water, since nothing in the charter act or general law can be fairly held to limit the bona fide discretion necessarily vested in the city for the public welfare.

It is contended that, even if the city had the power to make the contract with the respondent, the particular contract is void, because it undertakes to confer an exclusive privilege to fix rates, to limit the capacity of the plant, to exempt the property from taxation for ten years, to provide an unlawful levy of taxes and appropriation of funds, to divide municipal fines, to guarantee interest on respondent's bonds, and to regulate subscriptions to the stocks and bonds of the respondent.

Where a municipality, in the exercise of an undoubted power, confers by ordinance privileges and franchises for a proper purpose clearly expressed in the ordinance, which contains provisions sufficient of themselves to accomplish the expressed purpose, the fact that the ordinance contains separable illegal or improper provisions will not necessarily render the ordinance void in toto, when the elimination of the illegal portions will not cause results not intended, or affect the integrity of the remaining portions for the purposes designated by the ordinance.

Provisions of law applicable to the subject-matter of contracts are parts of the contracts, whether so expressed or referred to in the contracts or not.

Where the law authorizes the regulation of service rendered the public, such law becomes a part of and controls contracts providing for the public service. State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 52 Fla. 646, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506, 41 So. 705.

Where a municipal contract for the rendering of public service contains provisions that would be unenforceable, because unreasonable, and the law provides for the regulation of the service rendered under the contract, such right to regulate may relieve the apparent unreasonable features of the contract.

Municipal contracts for the rendering of public service will be sustained, where the power is given to make the contract, and the terms of the contract, taken with the law controlling them, are not clearly violative of some provision or principle of law.

The powers conferred upon the city of Tampa by its charter and by general law do not give to the city authority to grant an exclusive privilege to use the streets of the city for the purpose of furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants (Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Ocala Street & Suburban R. Co. 39 Fla. 306, 22 So. 692; Capital City Light & Fuel Co. v. Tallahassee, 42 Fla. 402, 28 So. 810); but the respondent expressly disclaims any such exclusive right.

The provision contained in the contract as to rates to be charged for the water is not void under the law; but it is subject to and is controlled by the right of the legislature to provide for regulating the rates under the provisions of § 30, art. 16, of the Constitution. Tampa v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 45 Fla. 600, 34 So. 631.

The provision for reservoirs, pipes, mains, etc., of specified dimensions, clearly has reference to the necessities of the city when the contract was made; and such provision is to be taken in connection with other provisions, and with the declared purpose of the contract "to obtain for the use of the inhabitants of said city an abundant supply of good water for all purposes." The provisions that the respondent should furnish "a first-class fire protection;" and that, "as the city grows and . . . should desire new hydrants, the party of the second part should erect them, and the city shall pay for them," and to "extend the water mains to any part of the said city, when ordered to do so;" and "that the main or pipe system shall be laid in such streets as shall give the greatest amount of fire protection and the distribution of an adequate amount of water to the consumers;" and other provisions of the ordinance contract,—must be considered as having reference to the necessities of the future as to increased capacity, and to the governmental authority to regulate and control such matters as they affect the rights of the public. See § 8 of article 8 and the declaration fails to allege that the injury to the live stock was occasioned by the fraud or gross negligence of the company or its employees." The plaintiff not desiring to amend his declaration, judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out a writ of error.

In Clyde S. S. Co. v. Burrows, 36 Fla. 121, 18 So. 349, we pointed out that common carriers, by the common-law rule, are held to a very strict accountability for the loss of goods and chattels received for carriage; such accountability being independent of contract and imposed by law on grounds of public policy and commercial necessity for the protection of the owner of the property. The court said: "In the absence of a special contract restricting or modifying a common carrier's common-law liability in some particular which the courts may not consider unreasonable or subversive of public policy, such carrier is an insurer against all risks of loss or injury, except those resulting directly from the act of God or the public enemy and without the intervention of human agency while the carrier is in line of duty." Where the happening of the injury has been contributed to by the carrier, or would not have resulted from the act of God but for the carrier's negligence or departure from the line of his duty, he is not protected. The liability of a common carrier as an insurer does not extend to any damage resulting from any intrinsic cause against which care and foresight could not provide, for such cause is within the principle which excuses common carriers from loss or damage resulting from the act of God. Norris v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 23 Fla. 182, 11 Am. St. Rep. 355, 1 So. 475. Under this rule, the liability of the carrier, undertaking to transport live stock for those who choose to employ him, does not extend to any damage resulting from the nature, disposition, or viciousness of the animal. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 596, 51 Am. Rep. 489; Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240.

The doctrine of the common law, which holds the carrier to the liability of an insurer, does not deny to the parties to the shipment the right to enter into contracts with reference to this liability; and it is well settled that the owner and the carrier may by contract provide for a limitation of the carrier's liability that is not illegal or unreasonable. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Dexter, 50 Fla. 180, 111 Am. St. Rep. 116, 39 So. 634; 1 Hutchinson, Carr. § 419, and cases cited; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Witty, 32 Neb. 275, 29 Am. St. Rep. 436, 49 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. W. 183. Whenever a railroad company, therefore, receives cattle or live stock, and undertakes to transport the same for hire, such company assumes the relation of a common carrier, and becomes chargeable with the duties and obligations which are incident to that relation, except so far as such duties and responsibilities may legally be modified by special contract. Hutchinson, Carr. § 221; Moulton v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Minn. 85, 47 Am. Rep. 781, 16 N. W. 497.

A common carrier of goods, however, cannot legally stipulate for exemption from liability for losses and injuries occasioned by its own negligence or that of its agents or servants. Such a stipulation is, in this country, regarded as contrary to a public policy which recognizes the inequality of the parties to the contract of shipment at the time of its execution, and the exercise and enjoyment by the common carrier of franchises granted for a public purpose and for the public benefit. It is not simply a question between the carrier and the single individual with whom the contract is made. It is a question of public interest on the one hand and public duty on the other. In discussing the question of the public concern with reference to these stipulations, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, says: "If the customer had any real freedom of choice, if he had a reasonable and practicable alternative, and if the employment of the carrier were not a public one, charging him with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of his employment; then, if the customer chose to assume the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair, and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed. The business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do in fact control it, and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if any were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be adverse (to say the least) to the dictates of public policy and morality. The status and relative position of the parties render any such conditions void. Contracts of common carriers, like those of persons occupying a fiduciary character, giving them a position in which they can take undue advantage of the persons with whom they contract, must rest upon their fairness and reasonableness." See Thomp. Neg. § 6507, and cases cited; 1 Hutchinson, Carr. § 453; Clark, Contr. § 203; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 391; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. p. 458; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Milton, 53 Fla. 484, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560, 43 So. 495.

Some courts which have been inclined to recognize the validity of contracts relieving carriers from liability for negligence have drawn a distinction between ordinary negligence and gross negligence, as has been attempted to be done by the contract in the instant case. In Illinois the cases indicate a leaning in favor of allowing the exemption from liability for ordinary negligence of servants; but they deny the right to an exemption from liability for damage resulting from gross negligence of the carrier or his employees. This is also the view of the courts of Georgia (see Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240) and South Dakota (see Meuer v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 S. D. 568, 25 L.R.A. 81, 49 Am. St. Rep. 898, 59 N. W. 945), where it is claimed that the statute allowing the carrier to limit his liability by express contract permits stipulations against liability for ordinary negligence.

This assumed distinction is repudiated by other courts, and, in the absence of a statute controlling us, we will adhere to the rule, supported by reason and authority, that denies the carrier the right to contract for an exemption of any degree of negligence, and hold to be ineffectual all stipulations for exemption from liability on account of negligence whether gross or ordinary. Thomp. Neg. § 6511; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 391; Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. v. Heaton, 37 Ind. 448, 10 Am. Rep. 89; Shriver v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 24 Minn. 506, 31 Am. Rep. 353; Moulton v. St. Paul M. & M. R. Co. supra; Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Ragsdale, 14 Ind. App. 406, 42 N. E. 1106.

A failure to exercise the care and diligence due from railroad companies as common carriers is negligence, without any legal distinction as being gross or ordinary. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Witty, supra.

The contract in question here, seeking to exonerate the defendant company from liability for all except gross negligence, is obnoxious to the rule here announced. The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the plea, and the cause is reversed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

SALLIE HOOD
v.
FRANK E. HOOD.

ROSA HOOD, Admr., etc., of James Hood, Deceased, Garnishee, Plff. in Err.

(130 Ga. 610, 61 S. E. 471.)

Divorce — alimony — judgment in personam — constructive service.

A judgment in personam for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees cannot be lawfully rendered in a divorce suit brought against a nonresident husband, who is not served with process within this state and does not appear in the case, but is only constructively served by publication.

(May 13, 1908.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Pike County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in a garnishment proceeding to enforce a judgment for alimony which had been rendered in a divorce proceeding. Reversed.

Statement by Fish, Ch. J.:

Mrs. Sallie Hood brought, in the superior court of Pike county, Georgia, a petition for divorce against her husband, Frank E. Hood, who, the petition alleged, formerly resided in that county, but was then "a resident citizen of the state of Texas." It was also alleged in the petition that the defendant was a son of James Hood, deceased, who, plaintiff was informed, died intestate, leaving an estate of realty and personalty in Pike county; that Mrs. Rosa Hood was the duly qualified administratrix upon such estate, and that the defendant, as an heir at law of James Hood, would be entitled to a distributive share of such estate, when the same should be duly administered and ready for distribution. The petition prayed that the defendant be enjoined from disposing of or encumbering his interest in his father's estate, that the administratrix be enjoined from paying to him, or to anyone for him, any portion of his distributive share in that estate, and "that a reasonable provision for permanent alimony be made for the support of plaintiff out of the interest and distributive share of said defendant in . . . the estate of James Hood." No process, however, was prayed against the administratrix, nor was she in any way made a party to the case. An order was passed by the judge that service be perfected upon the defendant, as a nonresident, by publication. This order was dated October 2, 1905. On April 2, 1906, at the April term of the court, the petition was amended by asking for $100 as counsel fees and "a reasonable amount as temporary alimony during the pendency of said suit." There was no appearance by the defendant in the case, but, upon the same date that the amendment to the petition was allowed, the judge, upon ex parte hearing of the application for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, "adjudged that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant . . . for $20 per month, from this date, as temporary alimony," to continue while the case should be pending in court, and for $100 as attorneys' fees.

On September 20, 1906, the plaintiff procured the issuance of summons of garnishment, based upon this judgment and directed to the administratrix upon the estate of James Hood. The administratrix answered, admitting that she was indebted to Frank E. Hood, the defendant in the divorce proceeding, in a stated amount. This answer was traversed by the plaintiff, and, at the April term, 1907, the issues in the garnishment case were, by agreement of counsel, submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury. The plaintiff introduced the record in the divorce proceeding, including the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, and other evidence. The court found that the administratrix had in her hands $409.29, as the defendant's distributive share in the estate of J. W. Hood, deceased, and ordered and decreed that the plaintiff recover from the garnishee $220. To this judgment the garnishee excepted, on the grounds that "Frank E. Hood was a resident of the state of Texas, as set out in the petition of plaintiff, that service was perfected on him by publication, that he made no answer and that the judgment against him was not a valid, binding judgment, that his property could not be taken under it, as it would be doing so without due process of law," and that, for these reasons, the garnishee "would not be protected in paying over the money in her hands as administratrix, belonging to said Frank E. Hood."

Mr. E. F. Dupree for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John F. Methvin and E. M. Owen for defendant in error.

Fish, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question as to the validity of a judgment in personam rendered by a court of this state against a resident of another state, without personal service upon or appearance by the defendant came up for consideration and decision at an early date in the history of this court in the case of Dearing v. Bank of Charleston, 5 Ga. 497, 48 Am. Dec. 300, in which there is a luminous and able discussion of the subject by Nisbet, J., who delivered the opinion of the court. It was there held: "The courts of this state have no extraterritorial jurisdiction, and cannot make the citizens of foreign states amenable to their process, or conclude them by a judgment in personam, without their consent. A judgment in personam, rendered against an inhabitant of a foreign state, in a cause wherein he did not appear, although notice was served upon him by publication, under the second rule in equity," was "held to be a nullity as to him." The question was again before the court in Adams v. Lamar, 8 Ga. 83, wherein the same learned judge delivered the opinion, and in which the principles announced in the Dearing Case were restated and followed. There are subsequent decisions of this court to the same effect, among them being King v. Sullivan, 93 Ga. 621, 20 S. E. 76, wherein the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, which is, perhaps, the leading case upon the subject in this country, was cited and followed, "in which it was held that a personal judgment rendered by a state court against a nonresident of the state in an action upon a money demand was without validity where the defendant was served by publication, but upon whom no personal service of process within that state was made, and who did not appear." See also Reynolds & H. Estate Mortg. Co. v. Martin, 116 Ga. 495, 42 S. E. 796.

Although this court has never positively decided that this principle is applicable to a judgment for alimony, rendered in a divorce suit against a nonresident defendant in which there was neither personal service upon, nor appearance by, the defendant, it strongly intimated as much in Fleming v. West, 98 Ga. 778, 27 S. E. 157, where the question was presented and discussed; but the decision was finally based upon the proposition that a decree for divorce and permanent alimony could not be granted at the first term after service by publication upon a nonresident defendant. In the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Simmons, it was said: "If he [defendant] was a nonresident of the state, service could be made by publication; . . . but, while service of a nonresident of the state by publication, if made conformably to the statute, would be sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the defendant so far as to authorize a decree for divorce, it has been held that it would not give jurisdiction so far as to authorize also a decree for alimony; that, while the decree in such a case is in rem in so far as it adjudicates as to the marital status, yet, if it undertakes as an incident of the divorce proceeding to deal with property rights of the defendant, it becomes in that respect a proceeding in personam, and, although it is competent for the legislature to authorize the courts to render a judgment for alimony upon constructive notice as against citizens of the state, it is not competent to do so as against nonresidents of the state. See. 2 Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. §§ 35 et seq.; Id. §§ 78, 79; Doerr v. Forsythe, 50 Ohio St. 726, 35 N. E. 1055, 40 Am. St. Rep. 703, and cases cited in notes." This is in accordance with the well-established general rule, which uniformly obtains in other jurisdictions, and which is laid down by text writers who have discussed the subject. In Stallings v. Stallings, 127 Ga. 464, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 593 (8), 56 S. E. 469, it was held that "service of an application for temporary alimony pending a suit for divorce and permanent alimony must be personal;" but in that case the petition in the divorce proceeding alleged that the legal residence of the defendant was within this state, but that he was without this state and would remain so for an indefinite period of time, and it was accordingly held that service could not be perfected upon him as a nonresident. It was held, though, that "a judgment for alimony is a personal judgment;" citing Fleming v. West, supra, and other authorities. It seems, however, to have been uniformly held in other jurisdictions where the question with which we are dealing has arisen that a purely personal judgment or decree for alimony, rendered in a divorce proceeding in favor of a wife against her nonresident husband, who has not been served with process within the state where the suit is instituted, but has been constructively served by publication only, and who has not appeared in the case, is void even in the state where rendered. Smith v. Smith, 74 Vt. 20, 93 Am. St. Rep. 882, 51 Atl. 1060; Ellison v. Martin, 53 Mo. 575; Anderson v. Anderson, 55 Mo. App. 268; Beard v. Beard, 21 Ind. 321; Lytle v. Lytle, 48 Ind. 200; Sowders v. Edmunds, 76 Ind. 123; Elmendorf v. Elmendorf, 58 N. J. Eq. 113, 44 Atl. 164; Rea v. Rea, 123 Iowa, 241, 98 N. W. 787; Johnson v. Matthews, 124 Iowa, 255, 99 N. W. 1064; Baker v. Jewell, 114 La. 726, 38 So. 532; Dillon v. Starin, 44 Neb. 881, 63 N. W. 12; Bunnell v. Bunnell (C. C.) 25 Fed. 214. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. pp. 584, 585, the learned author says: "But in divorce cases, no more than in any other, can the court make a decree for the payment of money by a defendant not served with process, and not appearing in the case, which shall be binding upon him personally. It must follow, in such a case, that the wife, when complainant, cannot obtain a valid decree for alimony, nor a valid judgment for costs. If the defendant had property within the state, it would be competent to provide by law for the seizure and appropriation of such property, under the decree of the court, to the use of the complainant; but the legal tribunals elsewhere would not recognize a decree for alimony or for costs not based on personal service or appearance. The remedy of the complainant must generally, in these cases, be confined to a dissolution of the marriage, with the incidental benefits springing therefrom, and to an order for the custody of the children, if within the state."

It has been held, however, in some cases, that a decree or judgment for alimony, based upon constructive service only, is valid as against property of the defendant husband which is within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and is specifically proceeded against in the divorce proceeding and described in the petition for divorce and alimony, and from which the alimony is set apart, or upon which the judgment therefor is decreed to be a lien; it being held that as to such property such a proceeding is in rem. Harshberger v. Harshberger, 26 Iowa, 503; Twing v. O'Meara, 59 Iowa, 326, 13 N. W. 321; Wesner v. O'Brien, 56 Kan. 724, 32 L.R.A. 289, 54 Am. St. Rep. 604, 44 Pac. 1090. See also Rodgers v. Rodgers, 56 Kan. 483, 43 Pac. 779. The ruling in Twing v. O'Meara, supra, went even further; for it was there held that, if there was property of the nonresident husband within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, it was sufficient if the petition prayed for alimony in the husband's property, without specifically describing it. But in a later case the supreme court of the same state held that a mere personal judgment for alimony, rendered against a nonresident defendant in a divorce proceeding upon mere constructive notice by publication, was void, and could not be subsequently validated or rendered effective by granting a judgment on a petition by the original plaintiff asking that it be confirmed and decreed to be a lien on the defendant's share in the deceased father's real estate, situate within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. Johnson v. Matthews, supra. In Ellison v. Martin, supra, the Missouri court held that a general judgment for alimony could not be rendered against a defendant upon mere order of publication, not followed by appearance of the defendant, and that the interest of the defendant in certain land in the state of Missouri could not be lawfully sold under an execution issued upon such judgment. There, as in the Iowa case last cited, the mere fact that the defendant had property within the state where the general judgment for alimony was rendered did not make such judgment valid as to such property. In Smith v. Smith, supra, the supreme court of Vermont not only held that a personal judgment for alimony, rendered against a nonresident husband upon mere constructive service by publication, was void, but also held that the fact that a resident of the state had in his hands money due to the nonresident defendant in the divorce proceeding did not give the court jurisdiction to order such money to be paid to the plaintiff as alimony. And in Bunnell v. Bunnell, supra, where the wife's bill for divorce had alleged the ownership by her nonresident husband of described property within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and had prayed for an injunction restraining its transfer and for alimony "out of the real and personal estate of the defendant," it was held by the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Michigan that a statute of that state which permitted its courts, in suits for divorce, to award alimony and sequester the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction, and appropriate the same to the payment of alimony, did not apply where the defendant was called into court by publication; and that a decree for alimony rendered against him was void for want of jurisdiction. In Thurston v. Thurston, 58 Minn. 279, 59 N. W. 1017, it was held that a wife could maintain in the state of her domicile an action for alimony, to be awarded to her out of the property of her husband in that state, and could make any person having possession of the husband's property, or holding title to the same in trust for him, a party to such action, for the purpose of applying the same to the payment of the alimony awarded her, and this would be a sufficient seizure of the property to enable her to proceed by constructive service against her husband.

In the case with which we are dealing, however, it is perfectly clear that the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees is not in any sense a judgment in rem, but is purely a judgment in personam. The court did not have in its grasp any property belonging to the nonresident husband, and did not even attempt to render a judgment in the nature of a judgment in rem against any property of the defendant within its territorial jurisdiction. While the petition alleged that the defendant had an interest in the estate of his deceased father, which estate, according to the allegations of the petition, was in the county where the suit was brought, and prayed that the administratrix upon his estate should be made a party to the proceeding, and that permanent alimony should be awarded the plaintiff out of such interest, no effort was actually made to bring this interest of the defendant in such estate before the court. The administratrix was not made a party to the case, and process was not even prayed against her. Whether she could, under the laws of this state, have been made a party to the proceeding for the purpose indicated in the petition; and whether, if she had been, the distributive share of the nonresident husband in the estate of his deceased father, in her hands as administratrix, could have been reached by a judgment for temporary alimony,—it is useless to inquire. It appears from the opinion in Smith v. Smith, supra, that this could not have been done under the law in the state of Vermont when that case was decided. What could have been done by the plaintiff in the divorce proceeding which is before us, or what might have been done therein by the court, under a different set of circumstances, are not questions before us. The question for our determination is: What was the effect of that which was done? We have seen that the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees was a mere general judgment against the defendant, and that this judgment was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. It follows, therefore, that this judgment could not be the basis for a judgment against the garnishee, as there has to be a valid judgment against the principal defendant before there can be a lawful judgment against a garnishee.

We have not overlooked the contention of counsel for the defendant in error that the garnishee cannot, in her bill of exceptions, attack the validity of the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, for the reason that the record does not show that the question as to the validity of this judgment was raised in the court below. It is true that the record does not show that this question was raised upon the trial by an objection to the admission of this judgment in evidence, or by a motion to rule out the record of the divorce proceeding, including this judgment, or otherwise. Nor does it show what the contentions of counsel for the garnishee were, in the argument upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to authorize a judgment against her. But, if the evidence offered by the plaintiff for the purpose of proving she had obtained a judgment against the principal defendant clearly showed, as we have seen it did, that that which she relied upon as being such a judgment was a mere nullity, then the evidence before the court did not authorize a judgment against the garnishee, and counsel for the garnishee could so contend in the oral argument before the trial judge; and, when the judgment against the garnishee had been rendered, she could present this contention in her bill of exceptions. It was not incumbent upon the garnishee to object to the introduction of the record in the divorce proceeding, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that no valid judgment for alimony and attorneys' fees could be rendered therein, and it was not to her interest to do so. It certainly was to her interest that the record of the divorce suit leading up to the alimony judgment should be introduced, if that judgment was to be offered in evidence, as it was this record which showed such judgment to be absolutely void. While she might, perhaps, have objected to the introduction of the judgment itself, because, from the record of the case in which it was rendered, it appeared to be void, or, after it was introduced, have moved to rule out, for a like reason, the whole of the record of the divorce case, including this judgment, her failure to do so did not amount to an admission that this judgment was valid. If evidence offered for the purpose of proving something to be a fact which it is necessary for the party offering the evidence to establish is subject to objection, but is of no probative value for such purpose, it does not matter whether any objection is interposed to the introduction of such evidence or not. Mere failure to object to it does not raise it to the level of proof of the fact sought to be established. It simply goes in for what it is worth; and, if it is worth nothing to the party introducing it, no finding in his favor can be based thereon. This court has held that, although hearsay evidence is introduced without objection, it is of no probative value; and the same principle applies here.

In reaching our conclusion that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed, we have not dealt with one feature of the case, because it was not reached by any assignment of error in the bill of exceptions. It clearly appears from the record of the divorce case that the nonresident defendant therein was never served, even constructively by publication, with the application for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, as such application was not embraced in the original petition, and the judgment granting the application was rendered on the same day that the petition was so amended as to pray for such alimony and fees. It has been held that, even where a resident defendant in a divorce suit has been regularly served, he is entitled to notice of a subsequent application for temporary alimony; and the same 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) principle would seem to apply in a suit for divorce against a nonresident defendant.

Judgment reversed.

DEADWYLER & COMPANY, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

KAROW & FORRER.

Sale — consideration — determination — impossibility.

1. A valuable consideration is essential to a sale, and, if its ascertainment becomes impossible, there is no sale. Where a contract is made for the sale, at a specified price per pound, of certain bales of cotton, even though there be a constructive delivery to the buyer, if the weights of the cotton be thus unknown, and such weights, by which the amount of the purchase price is to be determined, are, by such contract, to be ascertained by subsequent weighing by the buyer when actual delivery to him is made, and the cotton is destroyed by fire before being so delivered and weighed, and it becomes impossible to ascertain such weights, there is no sale.

Custom — statute — conflict.

2. A custom which contravenes a positive statute is invalid, and does not become a part of a contract.

Same — partial invalidity.

3. If a part of a custom would be valid if it stood alone as a separate and independent custom, such part would be invalid when another part of the entire custom of which it forms a part was invalid, unless it is reasonably certain that, to enforce the former as a separate and independent custom, would correspond with the intent and purpose with which the custom, as a whole, was established and used.

Case Note. — Effect on sale of destruction of property after actual or constructive delivery, preventing the ascertainment of the price according to the terms of the contract.

This note is confined to those cases in which it appears that the contract of sale sued upon concerned identified, specific chattels, the purchase price of which was to be fixed by ascertaining their quantity after they had been either actually or constructively delivered to the purchaser, and which were destroyed through the negligence of neither party, before the operation of weighing, measuring, counting, or the like, could be performed, so as to fix their ERROR to the Superior Court for Chat-ham County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of goods alleged to have been sold but which were destroyed before delivery. Affirmed.

Messrs. Adams & Adams, for defendants in error:

Even if § 3543, Civ. Code 1895, could be ignored, the risk was the seller's because the contract of sale was, in any event, executory, and there had been no actual delivery.

Holden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs brought suit against the defendants for the contract price of 100 bales of cotton alleged to have been sold by them to the defendants. Fifty-eight bales of purchase price in strict accordance with the terms of the contract. It therefore excludes those cases involving sales of goods not possible of identification because not separated from the mass of which they are a part; nor does it include those cases where it appeared that the goods were seized on legal process as the property of one or the other of the parties; nor cases where it appeared that the goods were destroyed before delivery.

In the cases to which this discussion is thus confined, the courts have not, as a general rule, paid much attention to the impossibility of ascertaining the purchase price with precision. And in those few cases in which this question is considered recovery was never denied to the seller merely because of the impossibility of determining the exact price of the goods sold, by reason of their destruction. Indeed, it is evident from these cases that the seller is at liberty to show the quantity of the goods by the best evidence at his command.

Thus, in Upson v. Holmes, 61 Conn. 500, in which it was held that the title to the goods had passed to the purchaser, and that the seller could recover their value on proper proof of their quantity, even though they had been destroyed, the court said that the circumstance that the goods were to be measured and paid for after delivery was unimportant, since that related to the time and place of payment, and not to the change of title. To quote from the opinion: "Where goods are sold and delivered to be paid for on the happening of a certain event, the vendor will not be deprived of his right to recover merely because the event on which payment is to be made has, by accident, become impossible. Upon the same principle, when the quantity is to be ascertained by measurement at a particular time or place, or in a particular manner, if such measurement becomes impossible, nevertheless the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) quantity may be ascertained in some other manner."

And in Allen v. Elmore, 121 Iowa, 241, 96 N. W. 769, it was said that, while the destruction of the article sold before it had been weighed rendered impracticable the ascertainment of the quantity by weighing, such quantity might be ascertained by the best evidence available, where the sole question was the amount to be paid.

And the language of Chief Justice Gibson in Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 357, 40 Am. Dec. 568, which was an action for the price of a raft of lumber, would seem to import that, even after destruction of the goods sold, the seller may, if the price is not exactly ascertained, nevertheless recover upon adequate proof of the quantity. He said: "By the bargain actually made, the vendor sold just so many feet as the raft actually contained. There is no process pointed out to ascertain the number; and why may he not recover in proportion to the number ascertained by the evidence?"

And in Martineau v. Kitching, L. R. 7 Q. B. 436, in reply to the question by the buyer's counsel: How could the buyer pay when he was to pay at a certain price per hundredweight, and the goods were never weighed, and therefore it could never be known with certain precision how many hundredweight there were?—Judge Blackburn said that, where the price was not ascertained, and it could not be ascertained with precision in consequence of the thing perishing, nevertheless the seller could recover the price, if the risk was clearly thrown on the purchaser, by showing the amount due as nearly as he could.

As has been before stated, most of the decisions regard as immaterial the impossibility of ascertaining the exact price in strict accordance with the terms of the contract. These authorities make the right of the seller dependent upon the fact of the ownership of the destroyed goods. If the the cotton were consumed by fire before there was any actual delivery. After some correspondence between the parties, the remaining 42 bales were taken by the defendants, and a payment for the purpose of settling the amount due for them was made, but which did not fully cover the principal and interest due; and the court, to whom the matter was submitted without the intervention of a jury, found in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendants for this balance, and found in favor of the defendants on the main issues in the case, the effect of which was to find that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the price of the cotton destroyed by fire. To this judgment the plaintiffs excepted.

The following facts appear from the testimony: The plaintiffs were cotton factors and warehousemen in Athens, and the defendants were cotton dealers in Savannah, with a buyer located in Athens. There was evidence by the plaintiffs to show that there was in the Athens market, among cotton factors and warehousemen, and buyers from them, the following custom: The factor would extract from each bale of cotton in their possession for sale a sample, in which was wrapped a tag on which was written the number and marks of the bale from which it was drawn, and to the bale was attached a duplicate tag having on it the same number of marks. This sample, with its inclosed tag, was taken to the sample room and there kept for exhibition to and examination by prospective buyers. The bale in the warehouse represented by the sample could be positively identified by the duplicate tag attached thereto. When a buyer wished to purchase cotton, he would examine these samples and agree with the cotton factors on the price to be paid for each bale represented by the respective samples. It was also the custom of the market that, title has passed to the buyer, the risk has also become his. Therefore, when a seller seeks to recover the price of goods which have been delivered to a buyer, but which have been destroyed before the quantity has been ascertained and the price fixed, it is incumbent upon the seller to show that he has parted with the ownership of the goods. And this, the courts hold, is to be determined from the intent of the parties; and therefore they apply themselves to discover what that intent is from the contract and the circumstances surrounding the sale.

Thus, in Ober v. Carson, 62 Mo. 209. it was said that the question of transferring title to, and vesting title in, the purchaser, always involved an inquiry into the intent of the contracting parties; and that it was to be ascertained whether the negotiations and acts showed an intention on the part of the seller to relinquish all claim as owner, and on the part of the buyer to assume such control with all liabilities. Hence, where, after the goods are delivered, a mere operation of weighing, measuring, or counting, or the like, remained to be performed for the purpose of ascertaining the price, such subsequent operation would not be regarded as part of the contract of sale where it was the intention of the parties to complete the sale on delivery.

And in Wadhams v. Balfour, 32 Or. 315, 51 Pac. 642, it was said that, in determining whether the contract passed the title, the primary consideration was the intention of the parties thereto; and that, if the intention was manifested clearly and unequivocally, it would control.

And in Gonser v. Smith, 115 Pa. 452, 8 Atl. 770, the court said that the vesting of title always depended upon the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract and the circumstances; and that actual delivery, weighing, and setting aside were only circumstances from which the intention might be inferred; and that it was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of no consequence, in the way of passing title to personal property, that the quantity was merely estimated and full settlement for the same deferred until the quantity could be exactly ascertained after its delivery.

And in Gill v. Benjamin, 64 Wis. 362, 54 Am. Rep. 619, 25 N. W. 445, the court said that, where the manifest intention of the parties was to transfer the title, the sale might be complete notwithstanding the property was yet to be measured and the amount of the price yet to be ascertained.

One of the best expressions of this principle is found in the following language in the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Martineau v. Kitching, supra: "It is perfectly true that, where anything remains to be done with a view to the appropriation of the thing agreed to be sold by the seller to the buyer, it is plain that the property will not have been intended by him to pass to the buyer, and the property will not have passed. But it is equally clear that, in point of principle, and in point of common sense and practical wisdom, there is nothing to prevent a man from passing the property in the thing which he proposes to sell and the buyer proposes to buy, although the price may remain to be ascertained afterwards. . . . What is there to prevent the parties from agreeing that the property shall pass from one to the other, although the price is afterwards to be ascertained by measurement? I take it that is the broad, substantial distinction. If, with a view to the appropriation of the thing, the measurement is to be made as well as the price ascertained, the passing of the property being a question of intention between the parties, it did not pass because the parties did not intend it to pass. But, if you can gather from the whole circumstances of the transaction that they intended that the property should pass, and the price should afterwards be ascerwhen this agreement was made, and the samples, with the tags therein, delivered to the buyer, or left with the cotton factor to be sent for by the buyer, and the sale listed on the books of the cotton factor, such bales then became the property of the buyer, and were held by the warehouseman thenceforth at his risk. It was a part of the custom that each bale was to be reweighed by a weigher representing the buyer, in the presence of the warehouse weigher, and the cotton settled for by the buyer at these reweights on the basis of the price per pound agreed upon when the samples were examined and the contract made. The buyer could waive the reweighing and take the cotton at the weights when first put into the warehouse, but the custom was to reweigh each bale bought. If any bale bought was "falsely packed," or damaged, or was "mixed packed," or failed to come up to the sample, the buyer had the right to reject it. When the defects were not excessive, the seller would make good the defects by compromise or settlement of some kind. When the cotton was reweighed, a bill therefor was made out according to such reweights and the payment for the cotton made. Sometimes the buyer, at the request of the seller, would make a payment before the reweighing. The difference would then be paid when the cotton was reweighed. In this particular case the buyer of the defendants located in Athens contracted to buy from the plaintiffs, at a price of 11 3/16 cents per pound on a basis of Athens middling grade, 100 tained, what is there in principle, what is there in common sense or practical convenience, which should prevent that intention from having effect?"

The following cases also support the proposition that the destruction of goods sold and delivered under a contract of sale providing that the purchase price should be fixed by ascertaining the quantity of the goods sold after their delivery is in no wise material to the right of the seller to recover, though such destruction has made it impossible to ascertain the exact price stipulated for by the contract; and that such question is to be determined by the fact of ownership, that is, the passing of title, which is dependent entirely upon the intent of the parties as gathered from the contract and circumstances of the sale: Seckel v. Scott, 66 Ill. 106; Vehmeyer v. Earl, 22 Ill. App. 522; Welch v. Spies, 103 Iowa, 389, 72 N. W. 548; Burrows v. Whitaker, 71 N. Y. 291, 27 Am. Rep. 42; Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 357, 40 Am. Dec. 568; Bond v. Greenwald, 4 Heisk. 453; Wilson v. Shaver, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 110.

In accordance with these principles, it has been held that, where it was expressly stipulated that the goods, after delivery, should be at the purchaser's risk, the seller may recover, though the goods were destroyed before their quantity was ascertained so as to fix the price as stipulated in the contract of sale. Bass v. Walsh, 39 Mo. 192; Castle v. Playford, L. R. 7 Exch. 98, reversing L. R. 5 Exch. 165.

But in Prescott v. Locke, 51 N. H. 94, 12 Am. Rep. 55, it was said, upon the question whether the sale was perfected so as to pass title to the goods purchased to, and impose the risk of their destruction upon, the buyer, that, whatever might have been the intention of either party or both, it must be controlled by the statute of frauds; and as, by the terms of that statute, the buyer must, in the absence of part payment or memorandum, accept and actually receive the property, both these conditions must be fulfilled before the title and risk can be transferred; and that where a buyer selected the goods purchased, but did 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) not count them, though they were counted by the seller, which count the buyer refused to accept, and they were burned before they were counted by the buyer, such selection on the part of the buyer was not an acceptance of quantity, but only of quality, and that the quantity and the price of the quantity was therefore indeterminate, and though there was a manual caption of the goods by the buyer at the place of delivery, such delivery and caption were not enough to transfer the title without an acceptance of the property as a determined quantity, for such an acceptance depended upon the counting. It was accordingly held that the title had not passed, and that the loss of the goods by fire must be borne by the seller.

In attempting to determine the intent of the parties from the delivery and acceptance of purchased goods the price of which is to be afterwards fixed by ascertainment of their quantity, many of the courts look upon the fact that the goods were delivered as creating a strong presumption that the title and risk were also intended to become the buyer's, and refuse to see in the postponement of the ascertainment of the quantity until after delivery any intent upon the part of the parties to change this presumption.

Thus, in Cunningham v. Ashbrook, 20 Mo. 553, a leading and important case upon the question here discussed, the judgment of the trial court was reversed because of a charge that, if the chattels were sold by net weight, to be ascertained after delivery, the presumption that the sale was completed by delivery was met and repelled, and the loss fell upon the seller, unless he showed that the parties intended the sale to be complete upon delivery. The supreme court said that, although this circumstance was certainly proper for the jury upon the question of the intention of the parties, the presumption arising from a change of actual possession, that it was intended, also, to change the property, was not overcome, as a matter of law, by the fact that the thing bargained for was to be paid for by weight to be ascertained after delivery; bales of cotton from samples, on a Saturday afternoon. The samples, with the inclosed tags, were kept by the plaintiffs and placed in a basket in their office. On the books of the plaintiff these 100 bales were listed as having been sold to the defendants, and duplicate lists of the marks, numbers, and grades of the bales were made out, one for the scalesman, and one for the warehouseman. The buyer, Mr. Butt, took the list and the number of each grade and went back to his office. This transaction occurred in the afternoon, after banking and business hours. Early the following morning all of the cotton was consumed by fire, except the 42 bales above referred to. The samples were left in the office of the plaintiffs, subject to the order of the buyer. Prior to the fire the defendants' agent did not reweigh the cotton. Nothing was paid before the fire on the cotton bought. There was no express agreement about reweighing, or when the cotton was to be reweighed or delivered to the buyer, nor was there any express agreement about the time of payment. There was no testimony as to how long the 100 bales had been in the warehouse after being first weighed, nor was there any testimony as to whether or not the bales would come up to the sample.

1. The plaintiffs in this case contend that they are entitled to recover the price of the 58 bales of cotton sold and consumed by fire. The 42 bales not destroyed were delivered to the defendants and paid for by them, except a small balance due as interest.

and that, if the delivery was for the purpose of passing the property, it had that effect, although the price was afterwards to be ascertained and paid according to the net weight.

And in Allen v. Elmore, 121 Iowa, 241, 96 N. W. 769, the court said that the question of title was one of intent; and that, where the payment of the purchase price was not a condition precedent to the passing of title, the fact that weighing or measuring the goods sold and delivered still remained necessary to determine the price would not indicate an intention that the title should not pass until such acts were done.

In Haxall Bros. v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 434, and Haxall Bros. v. Barbour, 15 Gratt. 454, note, the rule was laid down that, where the subject of a contract of sale had been actually delivered, the mere fact that weighing, counting, or measuring was yet to be done by the buyer in order simply to ascertain the aggregate sum of money which he was to pay as the price therefor did not of itself show such a defect in the transfer of title as would prevent the risk of loss from being cast upon the buyer.

So, in Wadhams v. Balfour, 32 Or. 315, 51 Pac. 642, it was said that, where there was an unconditional delivery of specific property, though something remained to be done to ascertain its quantity for the purpose of determining the price, such delivery would overcome the presumption of law that, if something remained to be done for the purpose of fixing the amount to be paid for goods sold, the title did not pass until the act was done.

Of course, this presumption is not conclusive, and may be overcome by evidence of a contrary intent by the parties when the goods were delivered to the purchaser. Thus, in Wilkinson v. Holiday, 33 Mich. 386, Judge Cooley said that, while delivery was usually a significant fact in the sale of goods, it was not conclusive as to the passage of the title; and, as there might be an express understanding that the title should not pass, there might also be an implied understanding of a like character. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So the judgment of the trial court was reversed because the trial judge had held, as a matter of law, that the title had passed upon delivery. To the same effect is Lingham v. Eggleston, 27 Mich. 324.

On the other hand, in Towne v. Davis, 66 N. H. 396, 22 Atl. 450, the rule was declared to be that, if anything remained to be done between the parties to a sale of chattels to determine the price to be paid, the sale was not complete so as to pass the title, unless it could be inferred from the evidence that the parties intended the property should pass at once; and that, if the goods were yet to be numbered, weighed, or measured, or the like, the sale was prima facie not complete until the quantity was ascertained. The court cited Riddle v. Varnum, 20 Pick. 280, which is otherwise not in point in this note, to the effect that, when some act remained to be done in relation to the subject of the sale, as that of weighing or measuring, and there was no evidence showing an intention to make an absolute and complete sale, the performance of such act was a prerequisite to the passage of the title to the buyer.

Some authorities, in the absence of other circumstances showing the intention of the parties, look upon the question of the transfer of title in the class of cases included in this discussion as largely dependent upon which party the contract places the duty on of ascertaining the quantity of the goods sold. Accordingly, the rule is frequently laid down that, where the acts of measurement, counting, and weighing by the terms of the agreement or the uses of the trade are to be done by the seller, or by him and the buyer together, and, before this is done, the goods are destroyed, the seller will have to bear the loss though they are delivered to the buyer; but, if these acts are to be done by the buyer, the loss will be his.

Thus, in King v. Jarman, 35 Ark. 190, 37 Am. Rep. 11, the court, in holding that the title to the goods in question had passed to the buyer, announced the following proposition: "Where the minds of the parties have assented to the present purchase and sale of a specific chattel, which may be ecution issued upon such judgment. There, as in the Iowa case last cited, the mere fact that the defendant had property within the state where the general judgment for alimony was rendered did not make such judgment valid as to such property. In Smith v. Smith, supra, the supreme court of Vermont not only held that a personal judgment for alimony, rendered against a nonresident husband upon mere constructive service by publication, was void, but also held that the fact that a resident of the state had in his hands money due to the nonresident defendant in the divorce proceeding did not give the court jurisdiction to order such money to be paid to the plaintiff as alimony. And in Bunnell v. Bunnell, supra, where the wife's bill for divorce had alleged the ownership by her nonresident husband of described property within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and had prayed for an injunction restraining its transfer and for alimony "out of the real and personal estate of the defendant," it was held by the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Michigan that a statute of that state which permitted its courts, in suits for divorce, to award alimony and sequester the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction, and appropriate the same to the payment of alimony, did not apply where the defendant was called into court by publication; and that a decree for alimony rendered against him was void for want of jurisdiction. In Thurston v. Thurston, 58 Minn. 279, 59 N. W. 1017, it was held that a wife could maintain in the state of her domicile an action for alimony, to be awarded to her out of the property of her husband in that state, and could make any person having possession of the husband's property, or holding title to the same in trust for him, a party to such action, for the purpose of applying the same to the payment of the alimony awarded her, and this would be a sufficient seizure of the property to enable her to proceed by constructive service against her husband.

In the case with which we are dealing, however, it is perfectly clear that the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees is not in any sense a judgment in rem, but is purely a judgment in personam. The court did not have in its grasp any property belonging to the nonresident husband, and did not even attempt to render a judgment in the nature of a judgment in rem against any property of the defendant within its territorial jurisdiction. While the petition alleged that the defendant had an interest in the estate of his deceased father, which estate, according to the allegations of the petition, was in the county where the suit was brought, and prayed that the administratrix upon his estate should be made a party to the proceeding, and that permanent alimony should be awarded the plaintiff out of such interest, no effort was actually made to bring this interest of the defendant in such estate before the court. The administratrix was not made a party to the case, and process was not even prayed against her. Whether she could, under the laws of this state, have been made a party to the proceeding for the purpose indicated in the petition; and whether, if she had been, the distributive share of the nonresident husband in the estate of his deceased father, in her hands as administratrix, could have been reached by a judgment for temporary alimony,—it is useless to inquire. It appears from the opinion in Smith v. Smith, supra, that this could not have been done under the law in the state of Vermont when that case was decided. What could have been done by the plaintiff in the divorce proceeding which is before us, or what might have been done therein by the court, under a different set of circumstances, are not questions before us. The question for our determination is: What was the effect of that which was done? We have seen that the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees was a mere general judgment against the defendant, and that this judgment was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. It follows, therefore, that this judgment could not be the basis for a judgment against the garnishee, as there has to be a valid judgment against the principal defendant before there can be a lawful judgment against a garnishee.

We have not overlooked the contention of counsel for the defendant in error that the garnishee cannot, in her bill of exceptions, attack the validity of the judgment for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, for the reason that the record does not show that the question as to the validity of this judgment was raised in the court below. It is true that the record does not show that this question was raised upon the trial by an objection to the admission of this judgment in evidence, or by a motion to rule out the record of the divorce proceeding, including this judgment, or otherwise. Nor does it show what the contentions of counsel for the garnishee were, in the argument upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to authorize a judgment against her. But, if the evidence offered by the plaintiff for the purpose of proving she had obtained a judgment against the principal defendant clearly showed, as we have seen it did, that that which she relied upon as being such a judgment was a mere nullity, then the evidence before the court did not authorize a judgment against the garnishee, and counsel for the garnishee could so contend in the oral argument before the trial judge; and, when the judgment against the garnishee had been rendered, she could present this contention in her bill of exceptions. It was not incumbent upon the garnishee to object to the introduction of the record in the divorce proceeding, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that no valid judgment for alimony and attorneys' fees could be rendered therein, and it was not to her interest to do so. It certainly was to her interest that the record of the divorce suit leading up to the alimony judgment should be introduced, if that judgment was to be offered in evidence, as it was this record which showed such judgment to be absolutely void. While she might, perhaps, have objected to the introduction of the judgment itself, because, from the record of the case in which it was rendered, it appeared to be void, or, after it was introduced, have moved to rule out, for a like reason, the whole of the record of the divorce case, including this judgment, her failure to do so did not amount to an admission that this judgment was valid. If evidence offered for the purpose of proving something to be a fact which it is necessary for the party offering the evidence to establish is subject to objection, but is of no probative value for such purpose, it does not matter whether any objection is interposed to the introduction of such evidence or not. Mere failure to object to it does not raise it to the level of proof of the fact sought to be established. It simply goes in for what it is worth; and, if it is worth nothing to the party introducing it, no finding in his favor can be based thereon. This court has held that, although hearsay evidence is introduced without objection, it is of no probative value; and the same principle applies here.

In reaching our conclusion that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed, we have not dealt with one feature of the case, because it was not reached by any assignment of error in the bill of exceptions. It clearly appears from the record of the divorce case that the nonresident defendant therein was never served, even constructively by publication, with the application for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, as such application was not embraced in the original petition, and the judgment granting the application was rendered on the same day that the petition was so amended as to pray for such alimony and fees. It has been held that, even where a resident defendant in a divorce suit has been regularly served, he is entitled to notice of a subsequent application for temporary alimony; and the same 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) principle would seem to apply in a suit for divorce against a nonresident defendant.

Judgment reversed.

KAROW & FORRER.

(— Ga. —, 62 S. E. 172.)

Sale — consideration — determination — impossibility.

1. A valuable consideration is essential to a sale, and, if its ascertainment becomes impossible, there is no sale. Where a contract is made for the sale, at a specified price per pound, of certain bales of cotton, even though there be a constructive delivery to the buyer, if the weights of the cotton be thus unknown, and such weights, by which the amount of the purchase price is to be determined, are, by such contract, to be ascertained by subsequent weighing by the buyer when actual delivery to him is made, and the cotton is destroyed by fire before being so delivered and weighed, and it becomes impossible to ascertain such weights, there is no sale.

Custom — statute — conflict.

2. A custom which contravenes a positive statute is invalid, and does not become a part of a contract.

Same — partial invalidity.

3. If a part of a custom would be valid if it stood alone as a separate and independent custom, such part would be invalid when another part of the entire custom of which it forms a part was invalid, unless it is reasonably certain that, to enforce the former as a separate and independent custom, would correspond with the intent and purpose with which the custom, as a whole, was established and used.

Case Note. — Effect on sale of destruction of property after actual or constructive delivery, preventing the ascertainment of the price according to the terms of the contract.

This note is confined to those cases in which it appears that the contract of sale sued upon concerned identified, specific chattels, the purchase price of which was to be fixed by ascertaining their quantity after they had been either actually or constructively delivered to the purchaser, and which were destroyed through the negligence of neither party, before the operation of weighing, measuring, counting, or the like, could be performed, so as to fix their

on the delivery book of the plaintiffs was as follows:

Nov. 10, 1905. Sold to L. F. Butt. Agt.

—and so on, covering the 100 bales, showing the original warehouse weight of the 100 bales in the first column marked "Wt." and in the second column marked "Wt." the re-weight of the 42 bales not burned; but it was blank in the second column as to the weight of those burned. Before the 42 bales not burned were taken and paid for, they were reweighed and settled for by the re-weights. Where the price per pound is agreed upon by the buyer and seller, and there is no agreement between them as to the number of pounds in such bale, under the facts appearing in this case it is proper to hold that the understanding was that the cotton would have to be reweighed in order to ascertain the amount to be paid therefor. Such facts show an understanding between the parties as a part of the agreement that the buyer was to pay for the cotton a certain price per pound according to the number of pounds in the bales at the time of the consummation of the trade, and this number of pounds was to be ascertained by weighing each bale. Whether viewed from the standpoint of a custom, or from the law governing what occurred between the parties, independent of custom, the amount to be paid by the buyer for the cotton bought was not determined before it was consumed by fire, and nothing appears in the record to show that after the fire it was possible to determine this amount as to the cotton burned. The amount to be paid would necessarily depend upon the number of pounds of cotton in each bale, and there is no way by which it can be determined from the record before us the number of pounds in any particular bale destroyed by the fire. If there was testimony from which it could be implied that the cotton was weighed when first brought to the warehouse, it does not appear when it was thus weighed, and what would be the probable loss in weight, if any.

Under the record before us, it would be impossible for the courts to determine what was the amount of consideration to be paid by the buyer for the cotton which was burned, and, where the consideration becomes impossible of ascertainment, there is no sale, under the provisions of Civil Code 1895, § 3548, which is as follows: "A valuable consideration is essential to a sale; it must either be definite, or an agreement made by which it can be made certain; if its ascertainment becomes impossible, there is no sale." Where the consideration for the sale of property is to be determined by ascertaining its quantity, and meanwhile this is rendered impossible by reason of its destruction, there is a closely analogous instance to cases where the parties agree upon a sale of property, the value of which is to be fixed by a named third person, who refuses to act, or dies before fixing such value. In such cases the sale fails, because the consideration becomes impossible of ascertainment. See, in this connection, Elberton Hardware Co. v. Hawes, 122 Ga. 858, 50 S. E. 964. We do not mean to intimate that, in cases of the nature referred to, were the property before its destruction converted by the prospective purchaser, or its loss were to ensue from such negligence as would render him liable in his character of bailee independent of any connection with the proposed sale, or if the delay in reweighing before the property was destroyed was the result of his negligence and in violation of his obligation to reweigh in a given or reasonable time, or under some other circumstances, an action could not be maintained by the seller of the property for the value of the property; but he could not recover on the contract as vendor of the property, there being in law no sale of such property where the consideration becomes impossible of ascertainment. Even if there was a valid contract to sell, and constructive or actual delivery of the cotton which was the subject thereof, there could be no recovery in this case, under § 3546 of the Civil Code of 1895, because of the fact that there was no sale, as this section, together with §§ 3545 and 3543, contemplates a sale. The provision in § 3546 that, when the property has been delivered to the buyer, the right of the seller to collect the purchase price shall not be affected by its subsequent loss or destruction, follows provisions in that section in regard to a sale of the property referred to, and is based on the fact of there being a sale; and, if there is no sale on which this provision is predicated, it would have no application. The provisions of this section have no application to this case, because, under its facts, there was no sale, either conditional or unconditional. The plaintiffs could not recover under § 3546, which provides that, when property is sold, and title is not to pass until the purchase money is paid, the loss of the property, without the vendee's fault, before such payment, falls on the owner. It is only under the latter part of § 3546 that the plaintiffs could recover the purchase money where cotton is sold with title retained by law in the vendor until the purchase money is paid, and it is destroyed after delivery to the vendee.

The latter part of this section provides that, when the cotton is delivered to the buyer and is destroyed, the right of the seller to collect the purchase price is just the same as it would have been had the cotton not been destroyed. Under the facts of this case, the seller could not have collected the purchase price if the cotton had not been destroyed until after it was reweighed, as it was sold at an agreed price per pound, and it was to be weighed to ascertain the number of pounds. The purchase price was not due, and could not be known, till the cotton was weighed. While the latter part of this section provides for the recovery of the purchase price in such cases, how can the purchase price be recovered when it is impossible to ascertain what is the amount of it? There is no purchase price when an effort is made to fix a purchase price and this effort fails and it becomes impossible to ascertain it. There can be no recovery of a purchase price of property when there is no purchase price fixed, and, without the buyer's fault, it becomes impossible to ascertain it. There can no more be a recovery of the purchase price when there is no purchase price fixed, and it is impossible to ascertain it, than there could be a recovery of a bale of cotton when there was no such bale in existence as the one sought to be recovered, or, if in existence, it was impossible to identify it. Property cannot be recovered which is not so described as to be capable of identification, nor can a purchase price be recovered when it cannot be ascertained what it is. This cotton was never actually delivered. The transaction occurred after banking and business hours on Saturday afternoon. In a letter from the plaintiffs to the buyer of the defendants, they say: "Had the cotton been classed earlier in the day, it would have been actually turned out to you on Saturday afternoon; but on account of the lateness of the hour at which it was classed, it was not to have been turned out to you until Monday morning. In the meantime the fire occurred." Hence it will be seen that it was not the buyer's fault that the cotton was not actually delivered and weighed before the fire occurred.

2. If the evidence in this case authorizes the conclusion that, when there was an agreement between the buyer and the cotton factor in the Athens market that the former should pay a certain price per pound for a bale of cotton represented by a sample, and the sample was actually or constructively delivered to the buyer; but there was no agreement as to the number of pounds in the bale, and the number of pounds was not definitely known at the time, but was to be determined by subsequent weighing when the cotton was actually delivered,—a custom existed in such market that the property became the property of the buyer and was held by the warehouseman at the risk of the buyer, such custom would be invalid if the cotton was destroyed before the weights were known, and it was impossible to ascertain such weights, thereby making it impossible to determine the consideration to be paid by the buyer for the cotton. In such a case, as shown in the previous division of this opinion, there would be no sale, and a custom to the effect that there was a sale, and that the property became the property of the buyer, would contravene this positive statute, § 3548, and would be invalid. Such custom that the cotton became the property of the buyer would also contravene the provisions of § 3546, which says that in sales of this kind the title to the property sold remains in the seller until the purchase money is paid. A custom contravening a positive statute is invalid. It does not become a part of a contract. Fleming v. King, 100 Ga. 449, 28 S. E. 239. If there be a custom that in cases like the one above named any loss of the property by fire before reweighing and actual delivery would fall on the buyer, such custom would be invalid, for it is predicated on the other custom that the title to the property passes to the buyer under such circumstances, which is invalid for the reasons above stated.

The custom that the ownership and risk passed to the buyer seems to be one entire custom, and that the risk followed ownership. This would seem to be a proper construction of the testimony, a part of which is as follows: "Under the customs of the Athens market in November, 1905, it was understood that anything designating a specific number of bales of cotton as being the cotton sold passed the title to the buyer. . . . As between warehouseman and buyer, it was considered the buyer's cotton so that he should insure it, according to my understanding at that time. . . . I was not in the cotton business in November, 1905, but prior to that time, under the customs existing, the title and ownership of the cotton passed when samples of the cotton were received from the seller by classification and grade. . . . When cotton was delivered to them, it was at their risk so soon as ownership could be proven. . . . Under the customs of said market, after the cotton had been agreed on and entered up on the books as sold as above, the cotton was regarded as at the buyer's risk. . . . It was regarded in said market at the time in question as transferring the ownership and risk of the cotton from the seller to the buyer. . . . Under the customs of the Athens market, after my transaction with Mr. Butt, the cotton and the risk were Mr.

Butt's." It appears that the destruction of cotton by fire, under the circumstances of this case, had never at any previous time occurred in Athens. However, if such custom that any loss of the cotton by fire would fall upon the buyer were not invalid for any other reason, would it not be invalid for the reason that it was uncertain and indefinite in its terms? The loss feature of the alleged custom is its chief feature; and can it be told, under the facts, whether the loss is to be the value of the cotton, or its contract price, and, if either, whether it is to be computed from first weights, or on a basis of probable loss in first weights? The testimony shows that there may be a loss from first weights; but there is no testimony showing usual or probable loss, or when the cotton was first weighed.

The custom that the cotton was held at the risk of the buyer was interwoven with and predicated on the understanding that, by the working of the entire custom prevailing, a sale was accomplished, carrying with it both title and risk of loss to the purchaser. When a valid custom exists, and the parties contract with reference thereto, the custom affects the contract in the same manner as would a statute which contained a written law applying to such contract the same incidents which the custom attaches thereto; and, in determining whether a part only of a custom shall be enforced, we are to be guided by the rule which obtains with respect to a statute a part of which is found to be invalid. The rule in such instances is announced by Justice Simmons, in Elliott v. State, 91 Ga. 694, 696, 17 S.E. 1004, as follows: "When a statute cannot be sustained as a whole, the courts will uphold it in part when it is reasonably certain that to do so will correspond with the main purpose which the legislature sought to accomplish by its enactment, if, after the objectionable part is stricken, enough remains to accomplish that purpose; but if the objectionable part is so connected with the general scope of the statute that, should it be stricken out, effect cannot be given to the legislative intent, the rest of the statute must fall with it. The courts cannot construct from a defective statute a law which the lawmaking body did not intend to enact, and which it cannot be presumed it would have been willing to enact. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 209 et seq.; Sutherland Stat. Constr. §§ 169-180; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 766, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656, 763, and cases cited." The central idea of the custom invoked in the present case is that risk follows ownership, and this accords with the general policy of the law.

as affecting the rights of the parties are made without reference to the provisions of § 3546, which provides that the seller may recover the purchase price when property is delivered to him, though under such section he gets no title thereto. We have shown, under the preceding division of this opinion, that there can be no recovery under that section. We cannot say that the parties establishing and using a custom that the risk was with the buyer would have done so but for the custom existing with it that the ownership passed to the buyer, carrying with it the incidents and burdens imposed by law, including that of sustaining whatever loss its destruction involved. As we have stated, the chief feature of the custom was that risk followed ownership, and its evident scheme and intent would be destroyed if it were held that, while ownership did not pass, because the custom was invalid for that purpose, yet the buyer did, under what was left of the custom, assume the risk of loss. Under the facts of this case, the loss could not for any reason be the buyer's loss if there was no sale, either conditional or unconditional. The custom that the risk passed to the buyer was merely an incident of the proposed sale, and, when anything occurred making it no sale, the incident thereto passed away with it. The plaintiffs in this case were not entitled to recover.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

RE ASSIGNMENT OF E. E. SNYDER.

F. W. PORT et al. Appts.,
v.

L. M. CARPENTER, Assignee of E. E. Snyder, et al.

Lien — deposit of title deeds.

Placing in another's hands a deed to real estate together with a written memorandum stating that the property is pledged to secure the one in whose hands it is placed against loss from becoming a surety for the owner will create an equitable lien on the property, enforceable against the owner's assignee for creditors.

Ladd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 13, 1905, E. E. Snyder, who operated the Bank of Olin as a private bank, executed a general assignment for the benefit of creditors with L. M. Carpenter as assignee. Lot 12 and the south half of lot 16 of Highland park in the city of Des Moines were part of the estate, but the deed to E. E. Snyder, under which he acquired title, had been deposited with F. W. Port under the following circumstances: In 1903 Snyder, base a lien, although referred to in a few decisions as being in force in this country, is more generally rejected as being violative of the statute of frauds, and incompatible with the system of registry of titles. Even in those jurisdictions in which it has not been rejected, it has failed to take root, having never seemingly been given actual application, unless it be in certain cases, hereinafter set forth, which may more properly be treated as instances of trusts ex maleficio.

The confusion which has been introduced into the subject by the citation of cases as supporting doctrines to which they merely allude is here relied upon as a justification for the setting out of such cases at greater length than their actual importance would otherwise warrant.

Such is notably the situation with respect to the decisions immediately following, which are commonly regarded as upholding the English doctrine:

In Jackson ex dem. M'Crea v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Cas. 114, 1 Am. Dec. 100, a deed of land sold was retained by the grantor as security for the purchase money. Four judges held that there had been no delivery, and that the title had never passed. Kent, J. dissenting, thought that the title had passed, and that the retention of the deed by the grantor by way of security created an equitable lien.

In Jackson ex dem. Lowell v. Parkhurst, 4 Wend. 369, the foregoing statement of Kent, J., that, where a deed was actually delivered, the legal estate in the premises vested in the grantee, and the subsequent pledge or deposit of the deed with the grantor, by way of security, would only give him an equitable lien on the premises in the nature of a mortgage, was repeated, but was material to the decision of the case only in so far as it indicated that such grantor was not re-vested with a legal estate which could be set up to defeat a recovery in an action of ejectment.

In Rockwell v. Hobby, 2 Sandf. Ch. 9, it was held that, in the absence of other proof, evidence of an advance of money and the finding of title deeds of the borrower in possession of the lender established an equitable mortgage. But, as remarked in Bloomfield State Bank v. Miller, 55 Neb. 243, 44 L.R.A. 387, 70 Am. St. Rep. 381, 75 N. W. 569, the case loses force from the further holding that, independently of the deed, the depositary was subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, whom he had paid.

Other references to this doctrine by the New York courts are purely obiter, as in Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 586, and in the cases of Chase v. Peck, 21 N. Y. 581, and Carpenter v. Black Hawk Gold Min. Co. 65 N. Y. 51, which contain allusions to Jackson ex dem. M'Crea v. Dunlap; Jackson ex dem. Lowell v. Parkhurst; and Rockwell v. Hobby,—supra.

In New Jersey, the recognition of the doctrine that an equitable mortgage may be created by the mere deposit of title deeds consists of obiter dicta to that effect in the cases of Robinson v. Urquhart, 12 N. J. Eq. 515; Brewer v. Marshall, 19 N. J. Eq. 537, 97 Am. Dec. 679; and Gale v. Morris. 29 N. J. Eq. 224, a different element existing in the case of Bullowa v. Orgo, 57 N. J. Eq. 428, 41 Atl. 494, infra.

In Hutzler Bros. v. Phillips, 26 S. C. 136, 4 Am. St. Rep. 687, 1 S. E. 502, after referring to the doctrine that, where title deeds are deposited as a present security, and with the intent thereby to give a lien upon the land, such deposit will operate as an equitable mortgage, as being firmly established in the English law, and in many of the American states, it was held that such doctrine could not operate to raise an equitable mortgage by the deposit of title deeds for the purpose of having an actual mortgage prepared for execution, in accordance with an agreement to that effect.

In Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. 277, 5 L. ed. 87, and in Biebinger v. Continental Bank, 99 U. S. 143, 25 L. ed. 271, the English doctrine is merely referred to,—in the one case for the purpose of excluding the question, and in the other in connection with the statement that there were no allegations in the bill which would bring the case within the principle of an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds, if that doctrine in England are entirely wanting in this country. It is not in harmony with our system of conveyancing and registry. The object of that system is to afford security to titles by a public record, which parties dealing with land may, and for their own protection must, examine, and on which they may rely. Secret transfers and liens are sought to be prevented thereby. For some or all of the foregoing reasons, the courts of this country have quite generally rejected the doctrine, as will appear from an examination of the following authorities: Probasco v. Johnson, 2 Disney (Ohio) 96; Vanmeter v. McFaddin, 8 B. Mon. 435; Gardner v. McClure, 6 Minn. 250, Gil. 167; Gothard v. Flynn, 25 Miss. 58; Meador v. Meador, 3 Heisk. 562; Lehman v. Collins, 69

Ala. 127; Bloomfield State Bank v. Miller, 55 Neb. 243, 44 L.R.A. 387, 70 Am. St. Rep. 381, 75 N. W. 569; Shitz v. Dieffenbach, 3 Pa. St. 233. In the last case decisions in several states often cited to the contrary are reviewed, and it is shown that, though they have recognized the English doctrine, in none of them has it been applied. As it is conceded by the English authorities to be in violation of the statute of frauds, and supported by precedent only, and is said to have occasioned much injustice, we are not inclined to adopt it, but the rather to follow the authorities of this country to the effect that the doctrine has no applicability because of our registry laws.

2. Appellants argue, however, that, conceding the law to be as stated, the objection thereof for a longer term than one year, should be in writing," etc.; as well as a statute declaring: "No estate of inheritance, or freehold, or for a term of more than one year, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing sealed and delivered."

In Hackett v. Watts, 138 Mo. 502, 40 S. W. 113, it was said that, while it has always been held in England that a lien was implied by the deposit of title deeds to land upon a loan of money; and while the same rule has been announced by some courts in this country, the better doctrine seems to be that the mere deposit of title deeds should not be regarded as constituting a lien upon real estate; the reason being that such rule would be in conflict with the uniformly established system of public registration and the statute of frauds.

In Bloomfield State Bank v. Miller, 55 Neb. 243, 44 L.R.A. 387, 70 Am. St. Rep. 381, 75 N. W. 569, it was held that a mortgage by the deposit of title deeds, without writing, is not effective, being violative of the statute of frauds and contrary to the policy of the recording acts; and that the exception of the statute of frauds with regard to estates arising by act or operation of law does not embrace cases where the creation of the estate depends solely on the intention of parties to a contract. The court in this case, upon reviewing many of the decisions cited as adhering to the English rule, reaches the conclusion that these cases are by no means so formidable as their bare citation in digests and text-books would indicate, their discussion of the question being generally limited to a citation of the English cases, and of an obiter character.

In Harper v. Spainhour, 64 N. C. 629, it was said that the doctrine of an equitable mortgage by the deposit of title deeds has never been adopted in North Carolina, the registration act making the possession of original title deeds of little importance.

In Probasco v. Johnson, 2 Disney (Ohio) 96, it was held that, as the system of registry dispenses with the necessity of an exhibition of title deeds, and supplies all the evidence to protect both vendor and vendee, the reason of the English rule does not exist; and that therefore no equitable lien can be created solely by the deposit of a title deed to the land sought to be subjected, accompanied by a parol agreement that it was thereby intended a lien should be created.

In Shitz v. Dieffenbach, 3 Pa. St. 233, it was held that the delivery of a title deed was not good as an equitable mortgage, being contrary to the spirit of the statute of frauds and acts for the recording of mortgages, and for entering up liens for public information.

In Parker v. Carolina Sav. Bank, 53 S. C. 583, 69 Am. St. Rep. 888, 31 S. E. 673, it was held that, although there are cases in North Carolina containing dicta to the contrary, it has never been decided in that state that the mere deposit of title deeds to secure a debt creates an equitable mortgage; the court saying that the reason of the rule as administered in England, where the system of conveyance renders it necessary to have possession of the muniment of title, does not exist in this country, which has a general system of registration.

In Meador v. Meador, 3 Heisk. 562, it was held that "the delivery by a debtor to his creditor of a deed made to the debtor for land, upon the agreement and understanding between the debtor and creditor that the creditor is to hold the deed as security or indemnity for debts due from the debtor, or for which the creditor is bound as surety for the debtor, creates no lien or mortgage, legal or equitable, upon the land embraced in the deed;" since a contrary holding would be a judicial repeal of the statute of frauds.

In Bicknell v. Bicknell, 31 Vt. 498, although it was not found necessary to decide the question, the court expressed itself as opposed to the doctrine of creating mortgages by the mere deposit of title deeds, saying that the great weight and consequence attached in England to the production of title deeds may properly have no such application where a system of registration of all conveyances of land obtains.

was obviated by the memorandum accompanying the deed. It is true that, as asserted by appellee, this was first executed to secure the sureties on the bond of the year previous, but it was returned to Snyder, and by him redelivered with the notes and deed to Port, to be held for precisely the same purpose in connection with the last bond. Something is said concerning the evidence being inadmissible to establish this owing to the statute of frauds. Without deciding the point, it is enough to say that no such objection was made by pleading, or to the evidence in the district court, and it is too late now to be of any avail. Crossen v. White, 19 Iowa, 109, 87 Am. Dec. 420; Holt v. Brown, 63 Iowa, 319, 19 N. W. 235. As we understand another objection, it is that the parties for whose benefit the instrument was delivered are not the same in both bonds. The only apparent difference is the omission of Lamb's name from the second bond. But according to Port it, with the deed, was delivered as security of the sureties on this bond, and claimants are conceded to be such. The deed accurately describes the property as in Des Moines, and the memorandum pledges as security "the Des Moines property," "to secure them against any loss by reason of signing" the bond of Snyder, to use his bank as county depository. While the instrument is informal, its purpose is manifest, and there is no reason for not enforcing the lien intended thereby to be created. No particular formality is necessary in order to make a valid

The case of Mowry v. Wood, 12 Wis. 414, and that of Jarvis v. Dutcher, 16 Wis. 308, which refers to it with approval, have been generally cited as holding that an equitable mortgage may be created by deposit of title deeds. On the contrary, the court expresses itself as opposed to such doctrine, the actual holding being that an equitable mortgage was created by the deposit of land certificates, accompanied by a writing subscribed by the depositor, stating that they were deposited as security for the payment of a debt. The court said: "Whether equitable mortgages may be created in this state by the deposit of title deeds, strictly so called, need not here be considered. In some of the states it has been held that they cannot,—that they are forbidden by the statute of frauds and inconsistent with the registry laws. . . . Whatever may be the merits, in opposition to the decisions of the English courts, of the objections founded upon the statute of frauds, those based on the registry laws seem to be supported by very strong reasons. Under their operation, the possession of title deeds is no longer necessary to the assertion of rights to real estate. Office copies answer every purpose, and may be used on all occasions, with the same effect as the originals, and without accounting for their absence. The possession of them, therefore, has ceased to be of any practical importance to the owner. Purchasers seldom examine them, but are governed by an inspection of the records; and it is very rare that they are transferred on a sale of the estate. This change of the law and policy in respect to land titles having obviated the necessity out of which the doctrine of implied or equitable liens arose, they would seem incompatible with it, and with the rights of third persons who may become interested in the estate."

The case of Hall v. McDuff, 24 Me. 311, sometimes cited as holding that an equitable mortgage cannot be created by the deposit of a title deed, does not seem to be authority for that proposition. What is therein held is that, where the grantor of premises obtained the possession of his unrecorded deed and held it by consent of the grantee until he should be paid the part of the purchase money remaining unpaid, he obtained no title which would defeat a prior mortgage given by the grantee.

But it has been held that, though the deposit of title deeds may not constitute a valid and efficacious mortgage, a court of equity will not enforce a return thereof before the depositor has complied with his part of the agreement. Sidney v. Stevenson, 11 Phila. 178.

Deposit accompanied by oral agreement to give legal mortgage.

A distinction is to be noted between an equitable mortgage arising from a deposit of title deeds from which an agreement to execute a mortgage is implied, and one arising from an oral agreement to execute a legal mortgage. Whether equity will enforce the agreement last referred to is a question with which the present note is not concerned, further than to set out those cases in which the question whether an equitable mortgage grows out of a deposit of title deeds accompanied by such agreement is involved.

In Foster Lumber Co. v. Harlan County Bank, 71 Kan. 158, 114 Am. St. Rep. 470, 80 Pac. 49, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 44, it was held that, where a borrower, when the loan was made, left his land contract with the bank, and authorized it to procure a deed of the property from the land company, at the same time agreeing orally with the bank that it should hold the contract, and afterward the deed, as security for the loan, until a formal written mortgage could be prepared, which he agreed to give, the oral agreement to give the mortgage furnished a sufficient basis upon which, after performance by the bank, to found a lien valid as against a subsequent encumbrancer with notice, irrespective of whether the deposit of the title instruments created a lien.

In Bullowa v. Orgo, 57 N. J. Eq. 428, 41 Atl. 494, it was held that the deposit of title deeds in pledge for the payment of a debt until a formal mortgage should be executed, under an oral agreement, constituted an equitable mortgage.

mortgage between the parties thereto. Frick v. Fritz, 115 Iowa, 438, 91 Am. St. Rep. 165, 88 N. W. 961. Says Judge Story: "If the transaction resolves itself into security, whatever may be its form, it is in equity a mortgage." Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. loc. cit. 533, Fed. Cas. No. 4,847. In Jackson v. Rutherford, 73 Ala. 157, the court held that "no technical words are necessary to constitute a mortgage which would be good at law any more than in equity. Any words would be sufficient which serve to show a transfer of the mortgaged property as security for a debt." Again, the same court observed in Kyle v. Bellenger, 79 Ala. 516, "a lien created by contract, and not sufficient as a legal mortgage, will generally be regarded as partaking of the nature of an equitable mortgage. The form of the contract is immaterial. Though a lien may not be expressed in terms, equity will imply a security from the nature of the transaction, and give effect as such in furtherance of the agreement of the parties, if there appears an intention to create a security." See Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 326, 46 Am. St. Rep. 56, 13 So. 948. The rule is clearly expressed in Howard v. Iron &

Land Co. 62 Minn. 298, 64 N. W. 896. "Every express agreement in writing, whereby the party clearly indicates an intention to make some particular property therein described a security for a debt, creates an equitable lien upon the property, which is enforceable. The form of the writing is not important, provided it sufficiently appears that it was thereby intended to create a security. If that intention appears, it will create a mortgage in equity, or a specific lien on the property so intended to be mortgaged." See also Higgins v. Manson, 126 Cal. 467, 77 Am. St. Rep. 192, 58 Pac. 907; Martin v. Bowen, 51 N. J. Eq. 452, 26 Atl. 823; Dulaney v. Willis, 95 Va. 606, 64 Am. St. Rep. 815, 29 S. E. 324; Hackett v. Watts, 138 Mo. 502, 40 S. W. 113; 27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 990. The memorandum in connection with the deed is clearly within the doctrine as announced, and, as the assignee, in acquiring the property, was charged with notice of outstanding equities, a decree should have been entered awarding a relief as prayed.

Deposit accompanied by written agreement.

The decisions uniformly recognize that the chief objection to the creation of an equitable mortgage by the mere deposit of title deeds is not applicable where the agreement indicating the intention of the parties to create a lien on the land to which the deed or other muniment of title relates is evidenced by a written instrument accompanying the deposit. The agreement, however, rather than the deposit, is the real basis for the equitable lien, the deed simply performing the office as assisting in the identification of the property to which the agreement relates. But the agreement must evince an intention to create a lien upon the land described in the deed, and not upon the deed itself.

In Woodruff v. Adair, 131 Ala. 530, 32 So. 515, it was held that the rule adopted in that state, that a lien cannot be created by a deposit of title deeds, was not applicable to a transaction whereby a mortgagor who had become the purchaser upon foreclosure assigned the mortgage, notes, and certificate of purchase; but that a valid equitable mortgage was thereby created.

In Higgins v. Manson, 126 Cal. 467, 77 Am. St. Rep. 192, 58 Pac. 907, a written agreement reciting that, in consideration of a loan, the borrower had deposited with the lender, as security, his government-land patent therein described, to be returned upon repayment of the loan at maturity; the borrower further agreeing that, should he fail to pay his obligation at maturity, he would transfer and assign all his right and title to the land,—was held to create a valid equitable mortgage, there being more than a mere deposit of the title deed; the court saying: "There is, we think, a clear intention to make a transfer of the land itself by Manson should he fail to pay as agreed. Reading the entire instrument, it seems to us the intention is made manifest that the land should stand as security for the debt, and the land is sufficiently described to indicate what was intended to be mortgaged."

In Stewart v. McLaughlin, 11 Colo. 458, 18 Pac. 619, it was held that the deposit of a certificate of purchase of state land to secure the payment of a note, taken in connection with a written agreement by which the maker agreed to assign said certificate to the payee in case he should fail to pay said note, created an equitable lien superior to that of a subsequent encumbrancer with notice; the court saying: "We do not think the question whether an enforceable equitable mortgage may or may not be created by the deposit of title papers is necessarily involved."

In English v. McElroy, 62 Ga. 413, it was held that the following words in a note for cash borrowed, "for which I have placed in his hands two deeds to 100 acres of land whereon I now reside, to hold as collateral security for the payment of the above note, the deeds to be returned to me when the note is paid," while not creating a perfect statutory mortgage upon the land, manifested an intention of the parties to create a lien, so that a court of equity will consider as done what ought to have been done, and which the parties intended should be done; and that, as between the parties, the depository should be deemed to have a lien upon the land as security for the money borrowed, and that the same be enforced by a sale thereof.

In Mallory v. Mallory, 86 Ill. App. 193, it was held that the delivery to a creditor by a debtor, of a deed to herself, accompanied by a writing, under seal, stating, in substance, that she had borrowed a stated amount and had delivered the deed to be held in escrow, and not to be recorded till said amount should be repaid within three years, and that she thereby agreed to bind herself, her heirs and assigns, so to do, constituted a valid equitable mortgage.

In Carey v. Rawson, 8 Mass. 159, it was held that, where an agreement was made under seal, that a deed to be executed should be deposited with a third person until a sum of money advanced by the grantee to the grantor should be repaid, or until a day specified, and, in default of such repayment, it should be delivered to the grantee, who might thereupon enter, such deed and agreement constituted a mortgage.

In Hackett v. Watts, 138 Mo. 502, 40 S. W. 113, it was held that, although a lien cannot be implied from the mere deposit of title deeds, there is a very marked difference between a deed to land, and a bond or contract for a deed upon conditions therein specified, which have been complied with; and that, therefore, the deposit of a contract for a deed as collateral security under a written instrument filed with it, stating that certain property, including "an article of agreement hereto attached," was deposited with the bank as security, created an equitable lien or mortgage on the property described in the contract, which was good as against a purchaser of the property with notice.

In Martin v. Bowen, 51 N. J. Eq. 452, 26 Atl. 823, it was held that a deposit of a title deed, in connection with a signed memorandum to the effect that such deed should be held as security, gave a right in equity to a specific lien on the land described in the deed; the court saying: "I think it sufficiently clear that the agreement in question amounted to an equitable mortgage, or an agreement to give a mortgage. It does, indeed, speak only of the deed as being security for the payment of the note; but there is an agreement not to sell, assign, or transfer the property mentioned in the deed, and an agreement that Martin shall hold the deed to secure him for any money he may have to pay on the note, so that, it seems to me, in order to give proper force and effect to the agreement, it must be construed as one pledging the land to the complainant."

No question under the statute of frauds was raised either by the answer or in argument."

In Rickert v. Madeira, 1 Rawle, 325, in which the question was whether the interest of the mortgagee could be taken on execution, it was said of title papers deposited as security with a surety: "It is, then, an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds, which may be created by parol, or by written agreement, as here, which is the better 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) and safer way, showing the nature and intent of the transaction."

In Luch's Appeal, 44 Pa. 519, a certificate, under seal, setting forth that the person signing it had left in the hands of his creditor two certain deeds as collateral security for a certain note, promising, should he fail to pay the note in reasonable time, to make deeds of the property, was conceded to be a valid equitable mortgage.

In Edwards v. Trumbull, 50 Pa. 509, the deposit of title deeds with a power of attorney in blank to sell and transfer the land, the depository giving a receipt therefor reciting that the deed was to be held as collateral security for the payment of a balance due upon certain stock, was held to be a mortgage.

In Spencer v. Haynes, 12 Phila. 452, it was held that, although a mere deposit of title deeds as a security, without any writing, would not create an equitable mortgage, a written instrument certifying that the signer had deposited a certain deed as security for a loan, and agreeing to convey such property should the loan not be repaid, if under seal, would be at least a good equitable mortgage.

See also Mowry v. Wood, 12 Wis. 414, supra.

But in Gardner v. McClure, 6 Minn. 250, Gil. 167, it was held that, where the instrument executed at the time of deposit, stating the object thereof, did not pretend to create any interest in the land described in the deed deposited, but referred solely to the deed itself, the statute of frauds presented an insuperable obstacle to the creation of a mortgage thereby upon the lands described in the deed; the court saying that the custom of giving security by the deposit of title deeds can have no coexistence with the system of registering titles to land.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

LA BARGE, Admr., etc., of August La Barge, Deceased.

v.

UNION ELECTRIC COMPANY, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 116 N. W. 816.)

Street railway — proximate rails — negligence.

1. A street railway company is negligent in maintaining the tracks used by cars running in opposite directions so close together that the natural sway of the cars in motion, emphasized by an uneven condition of the track which it permits to exist, brings passing cars within 3 to 6 inches of each other, without taking any precautions to prevent injury to passengers who, because of the crowded condition of the cars, may project some portion of the body beyond the sides of the cars.

Note. — As to exposure by passenger inside of street car of part of his body beyond side of car, see case notes to Georgetown & T. R. Co. v. Smith, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 274, and the later case of Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hadley, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 527.

As to contributory negligence of passenger in riding or standing on running board of street car, see case notes to Burns v. Johnstown Pass. R. Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1191, and Harding v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352.

Carrier — passenger — negligence — projecting head.

2. A passenger on an open street car cannot be said, as matter of law, to be negligent if, when compelled to stand because of the crowded condition of the car, he leans against a side post, and in the act of laughing throws his head back a few inches beyond the post, so that it comes in contact with a car passing in the opposite direction.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Dubuque County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hurd, Lenehan, & Kiesel and Matthews & Frantzen for appellant.

Messrs. T. J. Fitzpatrick and M. J. Wade for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant owns and operates a double-track electric street railway, at the place where the accident occurred, in the city of Dubuque, Iowa. On July 13, 1902, August La Barge was a passenger on an open or summer car moving north along the east track on Couler avenue. The car seats extended transversely, leaving no aisle or passageway down the middle, the passengers entering the space between the seats directly from the footboard extending along the side of the car. The sides of the car were not inclosed, except by upright posts erected at the ends of the seats. On the outside of these posts there were attached perpendicular hand holds or bars for the convenience of passengers in boarding or alighting from the car. While moving northward, a hinged or movable rail or guard was let down on the left side of the car, requiring passengers to enter and depart from the east footboard, and thus avoid danger of collision with cars moving south on the west track. This rail or guard when in place was a little less than 3 feet above the car floor, and with the posts above described constituted the only barrier or inclosure on that side. The deceased entered the car from the east side, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) and sat down at the west end of one of the seats. Shortly afterward, the car being full to crowding, deceased arose, and, giving his seat to a lady, stood up in the narrow space in front of the place where he had been sitting. Standing there with his back to the west, he appeared to be supporting or steadying himself against the guard rail and post, talking with some of his fellow passengers. In the course of the conversation something of an amusing nature was said or done, and deceased, in the act of laughing, threw his head back so that it extended a few inches beyond the outside of the post near which he was standing. At the instant of this movement on his part he was struck upon the head by the post or hand rail of another car moving rapidly southward on the west track, and fatally injured. The plaintiff charges the defendant with negligence in constructing its two tracks so close together that the cars moving thereon in an opposite direction would be separated by a space of very few inches, thereby exposing passengers to great danger of injury, especially when the cars were being operated at high speed. Other allegations of negligence were made, but not submitted to the jury by the trial court, and we need not here set them out. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, assessing damages in the sum of $3,000.

The appellant in argument rests its demand for a reversal on the single proposition that, upon the admitted and undisputed facts, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and the jury should have been so instructed. As this position taken by the appellant requires us to assume the truth of all matters which the plaintiff's evidence fairly tended to establish, we may say that, in addition to the facts hereinbefore stated, it was shown that the two tracks of the appellant's road at the place of the accident are in such proximity that, with two cars standing thereon at rest, the distance between them would be about 11 inches. The tracks were somewhat uneven, the rails being depressed at the joints, and, while this fact was not submitted to the jury as a ground of negligence, we think it is still a proper matter to be considered, as bearing upon the question whether the tracks were too close together to be operated with safety. It is a matter of common observation that car bodies, owing to their weight, size, and manner of construction, have some tendency to rock and sway upon their trucks while in rapid motion, and that such tendency becomes more marked upon tracks which are rough or uneven. The testimony of the several witnesses of the accident is to the effect that at the time the deceased was struck his head was thrown back not to exceed a distance of 3 inches to 6 inches from the outer edge of the post by which he stood, and if this be true, it would seem to indicate that in passing the two cars so away or rocked inward that the space between them was reduced to a very narrow margin. That it is evidence of negligence to construct parallel tracks so close together, for the operation thereon of open cars packed to their capacity with passengers, ought to need no argument. To the passenger standing or sitting at the end of the seat in a crowded car, the open side is a constant invitation to lean in that direction for breathing room, and for relief from the pressure to which he is subjected; and for the court to say that the railroad company owes no duty to guard the safety of a passenger who happens to reach his hand a few inches beyond the frame of the car, or of one who, while standing because of the crowded condition of the vehicle, voluntarily or involuntarily, permits any portion of his person to be exposed slightly beyond the post, would be to ignore the fundamental rule of the law of carriers, which requires active, vigilant, and constant care for the safety of those whom they undertake to transport over their lines. Living people cannot be packed into cars like bales of merchandise. Life presupposes motion, movement, and some reasonable degree of freedom of action, and those who cater to the public by furnishing means of carriage from place to place for hire must provide facilities and protection with these self-evident facts in view. Whether the lines of a double-track street railway are separated by a safe distance depends, in some degree, on the manner in which the cars are to be operated thereon. If intended for rapid transit, the tendency of the cars to sway or lurch from side to side, thereby reducing the distance separating them in passing, is a factor which cannot be safely overlooked, and failure to guard against such danger by increasing the space between the tracks, or employing other suitable devices to shield the passengers therefrom, is culpable negligence. But counsel insist with much earnestness that, in any event, the deceased was chargeable with contributory negligence as a matter of law. We think otherwise. There was no negligence in yielding his seat to another passenger. The company having filled the seats with other passengers, he was not negligent in standing up. There being no aisle in the center of the car, the only place to stand was at the outer end of the space in front of the seat or upon the footboard along the outside of the car. To uphold the appellant's contention is to say that the voluntary or involuntary act of the deceased in throwing his head backward in laughter slightly beyond the post against which he was standing was negligence as a matter of law, and that in so doing he did not act as a reasonably prudent man might fairly have been expected to act under the circumstances. In our judgment his conduct was not so glaringly imprudent that the jury might not fairly and reasonably acquit him of culpable negligence. No well-considered authority called to our attention supports the appellant's view in this respect, or holds the passenger to such extraordinary circumspection of conduct in order to claim protection at the hands of the carrier. It is a common, and not necessarily an improper, thing for street railway companies to load their cars, not only to the limit of seating capacity, but to fill the standing room inside and the footboards outside. This is often unavoidable, but the movement of cars and the handling of traffic must be so controlled and guarded as not to expose persons thus being carried to unnecessary or unreasonable danger. In other words, if the carrier exercises the right to carry passengers in this manner, care of their safety must be proportionate to the dangers to which they are exposed. Treat v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 131 Mass. 371; Griffith v. Utica & M. R. Co. 43 N. Y. S. R. 835, 17 N. Y. Supp. 692; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 135, 93 Am. Dec. 495; Geitz v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 72 Wis. 310, 39 N. W. 866; Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 556, 23 N. E. 889; Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234.

A passenger sitting by a car window rested his arm on the sill, his elbow projecting a few inches beyond the side of the car, and was struck and injured by another car moving on the adjoining track. Held, that the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury. Summers v. Crescent City R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 139, 44 Am. Rep. 419. And it has often been held that the slight exposure of a passenger's hand, arm, or head outside of a car window or doorway is not necessarily an act of negligence. Salmon v. City Electric R. Co. 124 Ga. 1056, 53 S. E. 575; Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Brophy, 105 Pa. 38; Dahlberg v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 32 Minn. 404, 50 Am. Rep. 585, 21 N. W. 545; South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. McCleave, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 1030, 38 S. W. 1055; Francis v. New York Steam Co. 114 N. Y. 380, 21 N. E. 988.

The contrary rule would be manifestly unreasonable and unjust. We think it unnecessary to go into a more extended review of the authorities cited by counsel. The conclusion we have announced is in harmony with the general principles of the law governing carriers of passengers as the same has, from time to time, been applied by this court.

It is sufficient to say that in our judgment there was sufficient evidence to justify the trial court in refusing to direct a verdict in defendant's favor; and as this is the only question argued by counsel, the judgment appealed from must be, and it is, affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

B. H. HANKEN et al.

Adverse possession — mistake as to boundary.

1. The possession beyond his true line, of the grantee of a particular lot, who occupies up to fences set over on his neighbor's property, claiming the ground as part of his lot and basing his possession on no other claim of right, is not adverse to the true owner.

Same — depot grounds.

2. Merely noting on a plat a dedication of land for depot purposes does not endow the entire tract set apart with the incidents of public use, so as to prevent the acquisition of title to it by adverse possession.

Boundary — acquiescence — railroad.

3. A railroad company is presumed, after the lapse of twenty years, to have acquiesced in the fact that a fence placed along land dedicated for depot purposes, but not in fact needed for public use, represents the true boundary line, although neither it nor the adjoining owner is required by law to maintain the fence.

(November 24, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Jones County dismissing a petition to quiet title to certain land as part of plaintiff's depot grounds, and quieting title in the cross petitioners. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to whether a railroad right of way is a proper subject of adverse possession, see case note to Roberts v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272.

Messrs. J. C. Cook and H. Loomis, for appellant:

Defendants must prove possession for more than ten years, which was adverse in character and under claim of right or color of title.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Snyder, 120 Iowa, 532, 95 N. W. 183; Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa, 148; Larum v. Wilmer, 35 Iowa, 245; Jones v. Hockman, 12 Iowa, 101; Lewis v. New York & H. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 202, 56 N. E. 540.

The occupation by the defendants was not adverse in its character as against the plaintiff, because in no instance was it inconsistent with such use of the premises as plaintiff desired to make at the time, or with its right to take possession for the purpose of such use in the future.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Snyder, supra; Slocumb v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 675, 11 N. W. 641; Barlow v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 281; *Michigan Mill. Co. v. Ann Arbor R. Plaintiff's title was a mere easement founded on grant for a public use, and as such could not be lost by mere nonuser.

The failure of the railway companies to take possession of the full amount of the grounds dedicated is no evidence of election not to avail themselves of the dedication to the full extent whenever the exigencies of the situation should prompt such act.

Messrs. Herrick & Bauder for appellees.

Ladd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plat of Langworthy was filed January 25, 1858, by William T. Shaw, and exhibits a right of way and depot ground, extending diagonally from the northeast to the southwest. On the space left for a depot is written "Dubuque Western Railroad Depot Ground." At each end of this ground the width of the right of way on each side of the track is indicated, but nothing on the plat shows the relative width of the portions of the depot ground north and south of railway track which was constructed shortly after the dedication. The plaintiff acquired, through mesne conveyances, the title to the road of the Dubuque Western Railroad Company, including the right of way and depot ground. The latter was not described in these several conveyances by metes and bounds, but in general terms. This is a suit to quiet title to the depot ground as dedicated. The several defendants interposed the defenses of adverse possession, boundaries established by acquiescence, and practical location and estoppel. In 1897 Hanken acquired the unplatted land north of the depot ground, extending from the east end southwest by 279 rods, and included in the conveyance was a strip of said ground 50 feet wide, so that boundary fence was but 50 feet north of the track and an extension of the right of way fence from the east. This fence appears to have been constructed at least thirty years previous to the trial, though by whom is in doubt. The railroad company reconstructed it in 1893, and this circumstance is corroborative of testimony that the original fence was erected ed by one of its grantors. The land was used for pasture most of the time, though occasionally put in corn. The boundary fence of Hanken extended westerly, veering out from the track to near the westerly end of the depot ground. Wilkin owns several lots to the west from Hanken's land, a vacant space lying between the tracts, and with these lots is included a strip of the depot ground 177 feet long by about 47 feet wide on the east end and narrower to the west. The boundary fence is conceded to have been maintained by Wilkin and his grantors for thirty years, and numerous evergreens were planted along this fence twenty-two years ago, which have grown into what one witness denominates "monarchs of the forest." A house was built in 1860 or 1861 by the owner. Shrubs also have been planted on the disputed ground, which has been occupied by Wilkin and his grantors for at least thirty years; the house being only a few feet back from the line as claimed by the company. South of the track, and at the westerly end of the depot ground, the defendant Dirks occupies, of that originally dedicated, a strip about 100 feet wide and 313 feet long, together with the lots adjoining. The fence extends northeasterly from the right of way fences, the entire distance, and has been maintained by him and his predecessors for more than thirty years. The house and outbuildings were erected on this disputed strip still longer ago, and evergreen, cottonwood, and fruit trees were planted in the yard and along the fence more than twenty years since, and have grown to be large trees. Considerable of the strip east of the house is used as a pasture, but in connection with other portions of the premises. To the east of Dirks's lots are those owned by Heyan. He has been in possession of a strip of land dedicated as depot ground for sixteen years prior to the trial. The fence along that occupied by Dirks extended northeasterly for 305 feet, and had been maintained twenty years when it was set over far enough by Heyan so as to leave a strip 50 feet wide at the southwesterly end and 32 feet wide on the east. This was used in connection with part of his lots as a pasture. The evidence does not disclose any other improvements save the existence of trees along the fence 8 or 10 inches in diameter, but Heyan testified that he had always "thought the land belonged" to him, and that the company had never claimed it until a year prior to the trial, when it removed the fence to what it claimed was the true line.

From this statement of the facts, it is apparent that the plea of adverse possession cannot be sustained. The defendants and their grantors did not acquire title to the disputed tracts, but to the lots abutting on them, and have occupied up to the fences because claiming the ground as part of their lots, and based their possession on no other claim of right. See Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa, 148, and other like decisions. But they have been in possession up to these division fences, as marking the boundaries to their lots, for a period longer than that of the statute of limitations, during which the plaintiff and its grantors have acquiesced without raising the slightest objection. The plaintiff company acquired the road in 1881, and no claim to these strips was asserted until 1904. If, then, the doctrine of acquiescence may be invoked in such a case, these fences must be regarded as indicating the true boundaries between the lots of defendants and the depot ground of plaintiff. Miller v. Mills County, 111 Iowa, 654, 82 N. W. 1038; Lawrence v. Washburn, 119 Iowa, 109, 93 N. W. 73. The authorities are in conflict as to whether an abutting owner may acquire title to a portion of a right of way by adverse possession; some decisions treating the possession of a railroad company of its right of way as that of its private property, to enable the corporation to perform a public duty, while others regard property acquired for right of way purposes and held in good faith for future needs as endowed with the incidents of property devoted to the public use. The decisions first mentioned are to the effect that title by adverse possession may be acquired. Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 154 Ill. 550, 39 N. E. 563; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Quinn, 94 Ky. 310, 22 S. W. 221; Matthews v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 110 Mich. 170, 64 Am. St. Rep. 336, 87 N. W. 1111; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stickley, 155 Ind. 312, 58 N. E. 192. The line of decisions last referred to declares that possession by the abutting owner not inconsistent with the existence of the easement is permissive only and cannot bar the claim by the company when the property is required for the prosecution of the company's business. Southern P. Co. v. Hyatt, 132 Cal. 240, 54 L.R.A. 522, 64 Pac. 272; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. French, 100 Tenn. 209, 66 Am. St. Rep. 752, 43 S. W. 771; Spottiswoode v. Morris & E. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 322, 40 Atl. 505. See Warvelle, Eq. § 471. The point was not determined in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Snyder, 120 Iowa, 532, 95 N. W. 183, but in Slocumb v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 675, 11 N. W. 641, the doctrine that property taken for the public use cannot be encroached on by the abutting owner so as to deprive the railroad company of title, save by appropriation absolutely inconsistent 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with such use when needed, finds approval. This doctrine is quite as applicable to depot ground as right of way where condemned for such use or actually occupied for that purpose. The difference to be noted is this: The statute determines the width of a right of way, while the extent of depot ground depends on the necessities of the company.

In the case at bar, the so-called depot ground was set apart in the plat long before any railroad was constructed. It was never adjudicated by condemnation or other proceedings to be essential to any company for depot purposes, and but a small portion of it has ever been occupied by the plaintiff or its grantors for that purpose: nor is it made to appear that that part not now so occupied will be likely to be needed in the future. Merely noting its dedication on the map as depot ground did not endow the entire tract set apart with the incidents of a public use. That which was actually occupied by the company for depot purposes may have been so used that it might not be subject to adverse possession, but certainly there is nothing in the record before us to indicate that the disputed strips ever have been so occupied, or that plaintiff or any of its grantors took or were in possession thereof for such purposes, or that these and much more will ever be needed by the company in the transaction of its business at Langworthy. The parties have assumed in argument that plaintiff acquired title under the plat. Whether upon abandonment title would revert to the original owner or someone else, and whether such reversioner would be bound by the fixing of lines by the company, may be considered when, if ever, these questions arise. It is enough now to pass on the rights of party originally acquiring title under dedication and those claiming under it. As neither the disputed strips of land nor the ground next to them appear to have been devoted to a public use, the doctrine of Slocumb v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., supra, ought not to be applied, but the boundaries defined the same as those between any other owners of adjoining lands. A railroad company is not compelled to fence the portion of its depot ground necessarily used by the public and the corporation in the convenient transaction of business. The same is true of the adjoining owner. The inference of an agreement upon a boundary does not arise from the obligation to fence or otherwise mark the division line, although this may add strength thereto, but from the fact that one or both the adjoining owners have in fact definitely defined such line by erecting a fence or other monument thereon, and both have treated the same as fixing the boundary between them for such length of time that neither ought to be heard to deny that it is in fact what both have by their conduct declared it. Even though neither defendants nor plaintiff were bound to erect the division fences, they were erected and have been maintained, and this was notice to all of them of the claim that they marked the boundary between the depot ground and the several lots. No objection was raised thereto for more than twenty years, and from its long silence plaintiff must be presumed to have acquiesced in this claim.

CITY OF HUTCHINSON.

(— C. C. A. —, 160 Fed. 41.)

Election of remedy — action — contract — quantum meruit.

1. Bringing an action upon express contract for electric light furnished a city is not an election which will preclude an action upon quantum meruit in case the first action is dismissed for failure to prove compliance with the contract.

Judgment — res judicata.

2. A judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover the contract price of light furnished a municipal corporation is no bar to a subsequent action to recover the value of the light upon quantum meruit.

(March 9, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of light furnished by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn and Adams, Circuit Judges, and Philips, District Judge.

Messrs. Frank Doster and H. S. Lewis for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. C. M. Williams, A. C. Malloy, and F. F. Prigg for defendant in error.

Philips, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Broadly stated, the question for decision on this record is whether or not, under the facts pleaded, a suit founded upon an express written contract for electric lights furnished by the plaintiff in error to the defendant city, and judgment for the defendant, is a bar to a subsequent quantum meruit action for the value of the service so rendered by the plaintiff and enjoyed by the defendant. As judgment was directed in favor of the defendant on the pleadings, we must look to them for the facts. The petition, in substance, alleges that the plaintiff furnished electric lights for the defendant on its streets at its special instance and request, from the month of July, 1903, to the month of November, 1905, inclusive; that the reasonable value of the light service so furnished was $262.40 per month, aggregating the sum of $7,423.81, with interest on each of the monthly bills rendered, the itemized account of which was attached to the bill. The answer, after denying that the plaintiff furnished said light at the special instance and request of the defendant, and alleging that such service was voluntary on the part of plaintiff, against the objection of defendant, pleaded in bar of the action that, on the 14th day of July, 1904, the plaintiff, in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, instituted against it an action to obtain judgment for the electric-light service aforesaid, as also for moneys alleged to be due the plaintiff for hydrant rental in said city, and that in said action the plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $8,301.77, which it pleads as an adjudication of the controversy in question. The defendant filed with the answer the record, pleadings, proceedings, etc., in said original suit as a part of the answer, to which reference is made, from which it appears that the first twelve counts of the original petition were based upon the written contract between the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant city for electric lights furnished to the defendant, covering the same monthly items sued for in the present action. Other counts in the original petition were for extra lighting service alleged to have been furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant. The other counts of the petition were for water furnished by the plaintiff's assignor to the city under written contract, amounting to $7,540, for which judgment was prayed, with interest. It seems from the verdict returned therein that the jury found the issues for the plaintiff on the counts for hydrant rental alone. As to the extra lighting service sued for, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that no evidence was adduced in support thereof. The charge of the court to the jury in said first action, which is presented as a part of the defendant's answer, explicitly required that to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff on ac-

G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 24 How. 333, 16 L. ed. 650, which was a much stronger case for the defendant than the one at bar, the court said: "It is not believed that there are any cases going to the extent that, because in the prior action a different question from that actually determined might have arisen and been litigated, therefore such possible question is to be considered as excluded from consideration in a second action between the same parties on a different demand, although loose remarks looking in that direction may be found in some opinions. On principle, a point not in litigation in one action cannot be received as conclusively settled in any subsequent action upon a different cause because it might have been determined in the first action."

It is the identity and the legal quality of the subject of the two actions, as well as the identity of parties, which create the estoppel. It may not depend so much upon the identity of the thing sued for, "but rather from the want of identity in the issues involved in the two actions." This is aptly illustrated by the case of Buttrick v. Holden, 8 Cush. 233. The action was for breach of contract to convey land. The defendant, inter alia, interposed the defense that theretofore the plaintiff brought bill in equity, based on the contract, for a specific performance, in which the rights of the parties in the premises were tried out, and the bill was dismissed. It is true there were other parties to that suit, but Chief Justice Shaw hit the mark by saying: "A judgment for the defendants in that suit does not tend to negative the defendant's breach of contract, on which this action at law is brought."

The rule as expressed by Bigelow on Estoppel, p. 75, is as follows: "The peculiarity of the plea of former judgment consists in the fact that it shows that a certain claim or demand has already been tried and determined. To this end it must be shown that there is identity between the present and the previous cause of action. The question then to be decided is whether the two causes of action are the same. If they are not identical, the defense is not good."

In McCall v. Jones, 72 Ala. 371, the court said: "The rule of res judicata or former recovery is confined to those causes where the parties to the two suits are the same, the identical point is directly in issue, and the judgment has been rendered in the first suit on that point."

In his work on Judgments (volume 1, § 259), Freeman says: "The best and most invariable test as to whether a former judgment is a bar is to inquire whether the same evidence will sustain both the present and the former action. If this identity of evidence is found, it will make no difference that the form of the two actions is not the same. . . . Whatever be the form of action, the issue is deemed the same whenever it may, in both actions, be supported by substantially the same evidence. If so supported, a judgment in one action is conclusive upon the same issue in any other suit, though the cause of action is different. . . . On the other hand, if different proofs are required to sustain two actions, a judgment in one of them is no bar to the other. If the evidence in a second suit between the same parties is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a recovery, his right cannot be defeated by showing any judgment against him in any action where the evidence in the present suit could not, if offered, have altered the result."

To the same effect is the text in 2 Black on Judgments, § 726. See also Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 372.

In the former action between these parties, the special written contract declared on having been admitted by the answer, it was only necessary for the plaintiff to show a substantial compliance with its requirements respecting the lights, and the failure of the defendant to pay therefor. As the contract fixed the amount of recovery, no proof was necessary as to the value of the material and services rendered; and no such evidence would have been admissible under the pleadings. Whereas, under the petition in the present action the plaintiff is required to go into the question as to the character of the material, the extent of the services rendered, the reasonable value thereof, and the enjoyment of the lights by the defendant. The only office the special contract might perform in this action would be to limit the amount of recovery.

The case of Franklin v. Matoa Gold Min. Co. recently decided by this court, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 381, 86 C. C. A. 145, 158 Fed. 941, presents an apt illustration of the rule of law in question. The action was predicated of a verbal contract for the delivery of certain bonds of the company for professional services rendered. The plea interposed by the defendant was that the contract was not in writing, and was, therefore, within the statute of frauds. This defense was sustained. But it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain action quantum meruit. No question could successfully arise in such second action that the former judgment was res judicata. Notwithstanding the lights furnished by this plaintiff may not have been such as the contract called for, it would offend the common-sense of justice that the city should use and enjoy what was furnished without paying the reasonable value thereof, not exceeding the contract price.

If there be any uncertainty as to whether the recovery had by the plaintiff in the former suit embraced the items of the account sued on in the present action, resort may be had both to the record and extrinsic evidence, "showing the precise point involved and determined." Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 24 L. ed. 214.

It results that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF EMPORIA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM JUENGLING.

(— Kan. —, 96 Pac. 850.)

Highway — negligence — standing on wagon.

1. It is not per se negligence for a man

Case Note. — Standing on driven vehicle as negligence.

One is not chargeable with contributory negligence by reason of the fact that he was standing up in a vehicle which, upon approaching a crossing, was signaled by a brakeman to pass through a gap in a freight train, and, as the driver reached a parallel track, in order to avoid being struck by an approaching train, which was concealed from his view by the freight train, started his horses so violently forward as to throw the plaintiff to the ground and injure him. Bryant v. International & G. N. R. Co. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 88, 46 S. W. 82.

And this is true even though the negligence of the defendant in thus creating an appearance of danger may have caused the plaintiff to stand up in the vehicle, as, in that event, his act would not be negligent, or preclude a recovery, although it may have contributed to his injury. Ibid.

Upon a second appeal of this case (see [Tex. Civ. App.] 54 S. W. 364), the former decision was followed; it being held by the court that, even though the plaintiff was standing or stooping, instead of sitting down, as were the other occupants of the wagon, he still was free from contributory negligence. The court observed that "it is not contended that there was any negligence on the part of those in the wagon in undertaking to cross as they did upon the invitation of the brakeman, and we are unable to find anything in the evidence which would authorize the conclusion that standing in the wagon was, either of itself, or in the light of the other facts, contributory negligence, under the settled rules of law applicable to such a situation. If . . . [plaintiff] was standing when they under-sixty-eight years old to stand up while riding on a dray in a city street.

Jury — view — oath of officer.

2. An additional oath need not be administered to the officer in charge of the jury sent to view the locus in quo, unless required by statute.

3. Failure to appoint a person to show to the jury the place they are sent to view is unimportant if they find and inspect the right place.

Same — misconduct.

4. A new trial will not be granted for misconduct of a jury sent to view the locus in quo in talking with strangers, taking measurements, and examining the earth, if no substantial prejudice could have resulted therefrom.

took to cross, the invitation of the brakeman had disarmed him of all apprehension, and the negligence of the company found him in that position, and he was not to blame. If the standing position was assumed as the result of the alarm, his act, however unwise, cannot avail the . . . [defendant] to defeat his action."

It was held in Magee v. West End Street R. Co. 151 Mass. 240; 23 N. E. 1102, that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that a fireman was not in the exercise of due care where, not having time to dress completely before starting for a fire, he proceeded to do so while riding upon a rapidly driven ladder truck, and, to steady himself and prevent his falling off while so doing, he stood with one foot upon the running board and with the other leg over the side piece of the outside ladder on the top tier, inserting it between the rounds of that ladder, and, while the truck was being driven sharply around a corner, the forward end of the ladders struck a street car, and they were pushed back upon the truck with such force as to cut off his leg at the knee.

So, it is not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a fireman riding to a fire on a hose wagon to stand up while putting on his coat, which he did not have time to do before starting for the fire, the firemen being allowed to dress themselves on the way in order to avoid getting wet, and to be in readiness for service upon arriving at the fire. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baker, 126 Ala. 135, 38 So. 87.

Per Curiam:

William Juengling was injured by falling from a dray, on which he was riding, in a street of Emporia. He brought action against the city for damages, claiming that his fall was occasioned by a wheel striking the cover of a manhole, which had been negligently permitted to project about 8 inches above the level of the highway. He recovered judgment, and the defendant prosecutes error.

It is contended that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the city, but the argument in support of this contention goes rather to the credibility of the testimony given by one of the plaintiff's witnesses. What the actual condition of the street was, and whether the city was negligent in permitting such condition to exist, were fair matters for the determination of the jury. The plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was standing up in the dray; and it is urged that this fact constituted contributory negligence on his part, especially in view of his age, sixty-eight years. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, however, that it is negligence for one to stand up while riding upon a dray in a city street.

The jury were allowed to view the place of the accident. Objections are made in this connection upon the following grounds: That the officer placed in charge of the jury was not sworn, that no person was appointed to show the jury the place, and that some of the jurymen were guilty of misconduct during the view. To these in turn it may be said: The statute (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4724) does not require any additional oath to be administered to the officer selected to have charge of a jury under such circumstances. The only purpose of having some other person accompany the jury is that he may show them the place to be viewed; and, as they found and inspected the right place, the omission was necessarily unimportant. Coughlen v. Chicago, I. & K. R. Co. 36 Kan. 422, 13 Pac. 813. The specifications of misconduct are that some of the jurors talked with an outsider about which way the sewer ran, that one made measurements at the manhole, and that another dug into the earth near it with a knife, and said that he had struck gravel, or rock, or something. It is apparent that no substantial prejudice could have resulted from any of these matters, and therefore there was no occasion for granting a new trial. 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 550; Indianapolis v. Scott, 72 Ind. 196, 205; and Hardin v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 208, 221, 49 S. W. 607, are cases where more serious misconduct has been held nonprejudicial. In the former (an action for damages resulting from a defective sidewalk) a juror, without authority, examined a sleeper at the place of the injury, breaking off pieces and thrusting his knife into it. In the latter (a murder case) one juror stepped the distance from the point of the homicide to the place from which a witness testified that he had seen it, and another measured a bullet hole in a neighboring wall.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE OF KANSAS EX REL. F. S. JACKSON, Attorney General,

v.

J. H. WILCOX.

Mayor — forfeiture of office — neglect of duty.

The mayor of a city, who sanctions a system of imposing fines upon places where intoxicating liquor is illegally sold, as a method of obtaining public revenue on the traffic, and who fails to make a bona fide attempt to enforce the law against them, or inform the prosecuting attorney of known violations of the law, forfeits his office.

(July 3, 1908.)

Note. — The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the removal of municipal officers for sanctioning or enforcing a system of fines as a substitute for closing disorderly houses, such as houses of ill fame, or houses where gambling is permitted or intoxicating liquors sold in violation of law, as an extensive search has failed to disclose any other case in which that question was passed upon.

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto to oust respondent from the office of mayor of Coffeyville for neglect of official duty. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. S. Jackson, Attorney General, John S. Dawson, and Charles D. Shukers for plaintiff.

Mr. J. P. Rossiter for defendant.

Per Curiam:

This was an action brought by the attorney general, in the name of the state, to oust J. H. Wilcox from the office of mayor of Coffeyville for failure and neglect of official duty in the enforcement of the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors and the keeping of gambling houses. It was alleged that he had failed and neglected to notify the county attorney of violations of the prohibitory liquor law, or to furnish the names of witnesses by whom such violations could be proven, and that, in co-operation with other officers of the city, he had purposely assisted in imposing and collecting license taxes on the business of illegally selling and keeping for sale intoxicating liquors within the city under the pretense of imposing fines. In his answer the defendant denied all of the charges made by the attorney general. Much testimony has been taken in the case, which shows that, during the term of Mayor Wilcox, and until about the time this proceeding was brought, saloons and joints where intoxicating liquors were unlawfully sold were in open operation in the city. There is some conflict in the testimony; but, after a careful reading and consideration of the same, we are satisfied that the unlawful traffic in intoxicating liquors was carried on with the knowledge and consent of the mayor and other officers of the city, and with the understanding that, upon the payment of pretended monthly fines of fixed amounts, the joint keepers would be permitted to operate free from interference by the city officers. These fines were regularly collected by the officers of the city and paid into the city treasury, and, until shortly before the commencement of this action, the joint keepers were given the immunity and protection which the payments were intended to secure them. The mayor appears to have proceeded on the theory that he was justified in following this course so long as the wide-open policy was in vogue in the county.

It is the finding of the court that the defendant did not give the county attorney notice of known violations of the law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, nor make a bona fide attempt to enforce the law, as his duty and the obligations of the law required; that the system of imposing fines was adopted as a means of obtaining public revenue for the city from the traffic; and, further, that it was carried on with the sanction and concurrence of the defendant. The finding and decision is that he has forfeited the office of mayor of Coffeyville, and a judgment of ouster will be rendered in accordance with the prayer of the plaintiff's petition.

Negligence—assault—proximate cause.

1. The assault by an intoxicated person upon, and his use of abusive language toward, another in a house where he is not shown to be a trespasser, gives no right of action against him to a pregnant woman in the house, not related to the person assaulted, who is out of sight although within hearing of the assault, and whose presence is not known to the assailant, for injuries resulting to her from fright causing mental pain and agony, illness, threatened miscarriage, and possibly permanent impairment of health, since, not knowing of her presence, the assailant cannot reasonably have anticipated injury to her from his conduct.

Damages — assault — fright.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants complain of a judgment of the Barren circuit court sustaining a demurrer to their petition, as amended, and dismissing the action. The appeal, therefore, presents for our consideration but one question, viz.: Do the facts alleged in the petition state a cause of action?

The original petition is as follows: "The plaintiffs, Nettie May Reed and her husband, I. W. Reed, state that, during the month of September, 1907, the defendant, Harry Ford, came to their house in Glasgow, Kentucky, during the darkness of the night, in a drunken condition, and, in front of the rooms in which they resided, and in the hearing of the plaintiffs, assaulted one James D. McConnell, who occupied a room near them, and then and there in a loud and boisterous manner cursed and abused said McConnell and threatened to kill him; that the defendant remained in front of this said room for a half hour or longer, and continued to curse and abuse said McConnell, and to threaten to take his life, who was perfectly defenseless and unable to resist him. The plaintiffs state that the plaintiff Nettie May Reed was, at the time, pregnant with child; that she was greatly alarmed and frightened at the action of the defendant as aforesaid, so much so that she was compelled to take her bed and remain there ten days; that her nervous system was greatly shocked; that she has since been threatened with a miscarriage in consequence of the fright received by her; that she has suffered great mental agony and physical pain from said fright; and that her health has been greatly, and, as they fear and believe, permanently, impaired as the result of the fright aforesaid."

The following are the averments of the amended petition: "Amending their petition herein, the plaintiffs state that the assault on James D. McConnell took place in the hall immediately in front of the room occupied by the plaintiffs at the time, and within 3 or 4 feet from the plaintiff Nettie May Reed; that the plaintiff Nettie May was made violently sick by the fright which she received; that she was compelled to and did take her bed for at least ten days, as the result of said fright; and they state that her health has been greatly impaired, and they fear permanently destroyed, as the result of the fright aforesaid; and they further state she sustained physical injuries in consequence of the fright aforesaid, and has been and was damaged, as set out in the original petition herein, in the sum of $500, which injuries are and were the direct and proximate result of the fright complained of by her in said original petition."

A careful analysis of the language of the petition and amendment will demonstrate that the sole ground of recovery alleged is that injury and damage resulted to the appellant Nettie May Reed from fright superinduced by the conduct of appellee in committing an assault upon, and using in her hearing and within a few feet of her profane and abusive language toward, a third person, one James D. McConnell; that the fright given her by the misconduct of appellee toward McConnell caused her great physical and mental suffering, made her ill for ten days, nearly produced a miscarriage, and perhaps permanently impaired her health. While it is alleged in the petition that appellee's assault upon and abuse of McConnell occurred in her house at night, where he had gone in a drunken condition, these facts did not necessarily make him a trespasser as to the person or premises of Mrs. Reed. It is alleged that McConnell occupied a room in the same house near hers, and not alleged that appellee did not lawfully enter the house. He may have gone there upon McConnell's invitation, or to see him on a business matter, and for some reason, whether with or without provocation, became angry with and abusive toward him after entering the house.

It will be observed that neither the original nor amended petition alleges that appellee, at the time of his assault upon or abuse of McConnell, was seen by Mrs. Reed; that he saw her, knew she was in hearing, or in a room near him, or that she was then an occupant of a room in the house; nor does either aver that the door to the room she was occupying was open, thereby affording appellee an opportunity to discover her presence therein. It is also true that the petition does not charge that appellee assaulted the appellant Nettie May Reed, that he knew she was pregnant, or that anything said or dene by him was directed to or at her. On the contrary, its only averments on that point are to the effect that McConnell, who was not a member of her family or related to her, was alone the subject of appellee's wrath and abuse. It is patent from the averments of the petition, as amended, that appellee committed no assault upon or trespass against the appellant Nettie M. Reed. The pain and suffering alleged resulted solely from fright, and were unaccompanied by any physical injury. The damages sought to be recovered are too remote and speculative. The injury is more sentimental than substantial. Being easily simulated and hard to disprove, there is no standard by which it can be justly, or even approximately, compensated. As said by this court in Reed v. Maley, 115 Ky. 816, 62 L.R.A. 900, 74 S. W. 1079, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 453, a case in which the question here involved was considered: "The objection to a recovery for injury occasioned without physical impact is the difficulty of testing the statements of the alleged sufferer, the remoteness of the damages, and the metaphysical character of the injury considered apart from physical pain." Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Elliott, 20 L.R.A. 582, 5 C. C. A. 347, 12 U. S. App. 381, 55 Fed. 950; Keyes v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 36 Minn. 200, 30 N. W. 888; Morse v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 117 Ky. 11, 77 S. W. 361.

It is equally certain that no right of recovery can be asserted in this case upon the ground that appellee's assault upon or abuse of McConnell, occurring at the house of the appellant Nettie M. Reed and in her hearing, constituted negligence for which he should be made to respond in damages for the alleged injury resulting to her. It seems to be well settled that no recovery can be had for injuries resulting from mere fright, caused by the negligence of another, when no immediate personal injury is received. Thomp. Neg. §§ 156, 157; Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 34 L.R.A. 781, 56 Am. St. Rep. 604, 45 N. E. 354; Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter, 93 Tex. 239, 47 L.R.A. 325, 77 Am. St. Rep. 860, 54 S. W. 944. Moreover, under the facts alleged, negligence can in no event be imputed to appellee in this case, or regarded as the proximate cause of appellant's injuries; for, not seeing appellant, being unseen by her, and not knowing of her presence in the adjacent room, it cannot be claimed that he could have foreseen or reasonably anticipated that any injury would probably result to her from his assault upon or abuse of McConnell.

Being of the opinion that the petition fails to state a cause of action, the judgment sustaining the demurrer thereto is affirmed.

19 L.R.A. (N.S.).

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

ANNIE SPRINGGATE.

(— Ky. —, 112 S. W. 681.)

Insurance — forfeiture — waiver.

1. Notification of a policy holder by an insurer after his premium note is overdue that, unless the note is paid at once, it will be compelled to return the note, which will cancel the policy, is a waiver of the forfeiture for nonpayment of the note when due; and the insurer cannot thereafter insist upon the forfeiture upon learning that the insured was in a dying condition when the notification was mailed.

Same — nonreceipt.

2. That a letter from an insurer waiving a forfeiture for nonpayment of a premium note is not received or read by the insured before his death does not destroy its effect as a waiver.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Same — estoppel — authority.

3. An insurance company is estopped to deny the effect of a demand by its general state agent for payment of a past-due premium note as a waiver of the forfeiture caused by such nonpayment although the policy provides that no waiver of conditions shall be valid unless in writing, signed by an officer of the company.

(October 7, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Meade County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas W. Bullitt and William Marshall Bullitt, for appellant:

The letter of the insurance agents was not an unconditional demand for payment of the past-due premium note, and therefore was not a waiver of the forfeiture which had already lapsed the policy.

Walls v. Home Ins. Co. 114 Ky. 611, 102 Am. St. Rep. 298, 71 S. W. 650; Moreland v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 104 Ky. 129, 46 S. W. 516; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Duvall, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 441, 46 S. W. 518; Union

Note. — The question whether the unsuccessful attempt of an insurance company to collect an overdue premium, or note given therefor, will be deemed a waiver of a provision in the policy avoiding the same for the nonpayment of the premium, will be found discussed in the case note to Hes v. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 902.

Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Spinks, 119 Ky. 261, 69 L.R.A. 204, 83 S. W. 615, 84 S. W. 1160, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 913; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Pentecost, 105 Ky. 642, 49 S. W. 425; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. The letter was not received until after Springgate's death, and therefore could not have been a waiver.

The policy itself expressly prohibited the agents from making such a waiver.

Crutchfield v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. supra.

Mr. N. McC. Mercer, with Mr. Claude Mercer, for appellee:

The general agents of the company have power to waive the forfeiture clause in the policy, which provided for the forfeiture of the policy upon the nonpayment of a premium note, and thereby continue it in effect, notwithstanding the provision of the policy that agents have no power to waive forfeitures.

The insurer waived its right to enforce the forfeiture clause by demanding the payment of the past-due note after its maturity.

The insured died after the demand for the payment of the note had been made, and the policy was undoubtedly in the same force and effect as though the note had been paid when death came.

Kentucky Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Kaufman, 102 Ky. 6, 42 S. W. 1104.

Hobson, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 7, 1905, the New England Life Insurance Company issued to John C. Springgate a policy insuring his life in the sum of $1,000, payable to his wife, Annie Springgate, the annual premium being $37.70, due on April 15th of each year. The first annual premium was paid. When the second premium fell due on April 15, 1906, the insured paid $10.70 in cash and executed three notes for $9 each, due in three, six, and nine months. He paid the first two of the notes, but failed to pay the third note, due January 15th. The policy contained this provision: "In case any of said premiums or any premium note or notes given for the said premiums are not paid when due and payable, this policy and all payments made thereon shall thereupon become forfeited and void, except as provided by the statutes of the commonwealth of Massachusetts." The note also contained these words: "But this note, if not paid at maturity, is not to be considered as payment of said premium, and said policy will thereupon, without notice, become forfeited and void, except as provided by the statutes of Massachusetts." On March 4, 1907, Thomas & Kaye, the state agents of the insurance company at Louisville, mailed to the insured the following letter:

Mr. John C. Springgate, Guston, Ky.

My Dear Mr. Springgate:—

The thirty days' grace on your note expired February 15. This matter must receive your immediate attention; otherwise we will be compelled to return your note, which will cancel your insurance. Kindly remit to us by return mail the amount due, $9.50.

Yours very truly,

Thomas & Kaye,
General Agents.

The letter reached Springgate's home on March 5th, but he was then unconscious, and died the next day without ever knowing of the existence of the letter. After his death, Annie Springgate, the widow, remitted to the company the $9.50, as requested in the letter, but it returned the money to her with a denial of any liability upon the policy. She then brought this suit against the company to recover on the policy. The circuit court having entered judgment in her favor, the company appeals, asking a reversal on the following grounds: "(1) The letter of the insurance agents was not an unconditional demand for payment of the past-due premium note, and therefore was not a waiver of the forfeiture which had already lapsed the policy. (2) The letter was not received until after Springgate's death, and therefore could not have been a waiver. (3) The policy itself expressly prohibited the agents from making such a waiver." These objections will be considered in the order stated.

1. In Moreland v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 104 Ky. 131, 46 S. W. 516, the insured gave a note for a premium which matured on January 29th. He failed to pay the note, and in March the company, still retaining the note, demanded payment of it from him, and then sent it to its attorney for collection by suit. After this the insured died in July, and suit was brought upon the policy. After stating the facts, the court thus expressed the question before it: "And the question is: Can the company insist on payment of the note, and at the same time consistently say that the policy, having been forfeited by its nonpayment, remains forfeited? Or will not the real intention of the parties be effected by holding that, although the policy was forfeited by this nonpayment, yet, as the retention of the note and demand for its payment after maturity are acts inconsistent with an intention to insist on a continued forfeiture, therefore the forfeiture is to be deemed waived?" In determining the question, the court, holding the company liable, quoted with approval the following from 2 Joyce on Insurance, § 1379: "As a general rule, if the company has treated the policy as valid, and has sought to enforce payment of the premium, or has, otherwise, with knowledge, recognized, by its own acts or declarations or those of its agents, the policy as still subsisting, it waives thereby prior forfeitures." In Moore v. Continental Ins. Co. 107 Ky. 273, 53 S. W. 652, the facts were substantially the same as in the Moreland Case; the only difference being that a longer time had elapsed, and that the insured had promised the attorneys to pay the note. The same result was reached as in the former case. The question came up again in Walls v. Home Ins. Co. 114 Ky. 611, 102 Am. St. Rep. 298, 71 S. W. 650, and in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Spinks, 119 Ky. 261, 69 L.R.A. 264, 83 S. W. 615, 84 S. W. 1160, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 913, and on facts much the same as in the two preceding cases. In the latter case the court said: "It is the well settled law of this state that, if an insurer desires to avail itself of conditions in its policy to declare it forfeited for the nonpayment of a premium note, it must unequivocally elect to so treat it, and in fact then and thereafter so treat it. It will not be allowed, though, to claim both that it is not bound on the policy, but that the insured is bound to pay the note. Its action must be consistent. While it may retain the note as evidence of its nonpayment, it must not retain it or treat it as an evidence of that much indebtedness." It is insisted that these cases are to be distinguished from that before us because there the company made an effort to collect the notes through an attorney, a bank, or an agent, while here nothing was done but to write the letter quoted. But this difference does not go to the root of the matter, or affect the principle upon which the decisions rest. This principle is that the company must stand on the forfeiture if it wishes to have the benefit of it. It cannot claim the forfeiture, and insist on the payment of the note. Its assertion of a claim on the note is inconsistent with a claim that the policy is forfeited; for, if the policy is forfeited, there is nothing to be paid on it. To allow the company to treat the policy as valid after the right to forfeit it has accrued, and insist on the note being paid as long as it deems this to its interest, and then, when it learns that the assured is sick or dead, to rely on the past forfeiture, which, at the time, it elected to waive, would be to allow it to take inconsistent positions. So the question comes to this: Did the company, when the right to forfeit the policy accrued, elect to forfeit it or to treat it as a subsisting obligation? If it elected then to treat the policy as a subsisting obligation, it cannot, when subsequent events make it to its interest to do so, withdraw the election it then made, and say the policy was forfeited. It is not a question of misleading the insured, to his prejudice. It is not material whether the note was sent to an attorney, a bank, or an agent for collection. These things may be evidence of the company's intention; but the intention may be shown otherwise. Forfeitures are not favored in law. When once waived, they cannot be afterwards insisted on. So in each case the question is: On all the facts, did the company forfeit the policy when the right to do so accrued? The letter in question plainly told the assured that the note must be paid at once; "otherwise, we will be compelled to return your note, which will cancel your insurance." This was in effect an unequivocal statement that the policy was not then canceled, and would not be if the note was paid. If the assured had remained in good health, and had sent the money to the company when his wife sent it a few days later, manifestly there could have been no forfeiture of the policy. The company was insisting on the payment of the note. It treated the policy as in force, and took the risk of the assured being in good health. It cannot be allowed to withdraw the election it thus made when it subsequently ascertained that the assured was then sick, and afterwards died. The letter shows an unequivocal election to treat the policy as a subsisting obligation. The wife, when she opened and read it, had the right to assume that, if she paid the note in a day or so, it would be all right.

2. It is not material that the letter was not received or read by the assured. The case does not turn on his conduct, but on the election of the company not to treat the policy as forfeited. This precise question was presented in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Duvall, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 441, 46 S. W. 518. In that case, after the note was due, the company wrote the assured a letter similar to that in this case. The letter was directed to Walton, Kentucky. He had left Walton, and gone to Gum Sulphur. It was forwarded to him at Gum Sulphur; but did not reach there until after his death. The widow sent the money, and the company returned it and denied liability. After copying at considerable length from the opinion in the Moreland Case, the court said: "It seems to us upon principle, as well as authority, that the appellant in the case at bar had elected to waive the forfeiture, and insist upon the payment in full of the note. Moreover, it is by no means certain that appellant did not at first elect to accept the payment sent to it by appellee, and only returned same because it had heard of the death or sickness of the insured. It can hardly be doubted that if appellant, at the time of receiving the inclosure from appellee, had not been advised of the death or sickness of the insured, that it would have proceeded to collect the check and have retained the money." The insured 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) ance company loses no right if it simply remains silent and retains the note in such cases as this (Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Peartecost, 105 Ky. 647, 49 S. W. 425), or if it accompanies its request for the payment of the note with a demand of a health certificate (Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Price, 117 Ky. 25, 77 S. W. 384), or if its conduct or notice is not such as to evince a waiver of the forfeiture of the policy; but the company cannot be permitted to waive the forfeiture when it supposes the insured is in good health, and to retract the waiver when it learns the fact is otherwise.

3. The policy provided: "No alteration or waiver of any of the conditions of this policy shall be valid unless made in writing and signed by an officer of the company." The general agent for the state was an officer of the company as to insurance policies, for he had power to make contracts of insurance, and this clause of the policy, like any other clause in it, may be waived by any agent authorized to make contracts of insurance. Mudd v. German Ins. Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 308, 56 S. W. 977; German-American Ins. Co. v. Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 106, 84 S. W. 551; Continental Ins. Co. v. Thomason, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 160, 84 S. W. 546.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down by Hobson, J., on December 2, 1908:

The general agent for the state represented the insurance company. His act in demanding the premium was the act of the company. It could not on one hand demand the premium and on the other insist on the forfeiture. Estoppels arise by operation of law. The acts of the insurance company here estop it from insisting on the forfeiture.

Petition overruled.

Mr. M. K. Yonts for appellee.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Jefferson circuit court, wherein appellee recovered $1,500 damages for personal injuries which she received in a collision with one of appellant's cars while she was being driven west on Frankfort avenue in a carriage. She charged that the collision and consequent injury to her was due to the gross negligence of the agents and servants of appellant in charge of the car. The answer, in addition to traversing the allegations of the petition, pleaded contributory negligence. A reply traversed the affirmative matter of the answer, and upon the issues thus joined the case was tried, and the verdict appealed from rendered. Several reasons were urged in the motion for a new trial why the verdict should be set aside 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) and a new trial awarded, but upon this appeal but one ground for reversal is urged, to wit, the failure of the court to properly instruct the jury on the subject of imputed negligence.

The appellant asked the court to give the following instructions: "(A) The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe from the evidence that the motorman in charge of the car that collided with the surrey in which plaintiff was riding was negligent in the management and operation of his car at the time of said collision, yet, if they further believe from the evidence that the person driving said surrey was also negligent at said time and place, and but for his negligence, contributing or helping to bring about said accident, the same would not have occurred, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find. (B) If the jury believe from the evidence that the driver of the surrey in which plaintiff was riding at the time of the collision complained of herein drove the same across the track on which defendant's car was running so close to the front end of said car that he rendered it impossible for the motorman, in the exercise of ordinary care, to stop his car in time to prevent a collision with said surrey, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find." This the court refused to do, and gave, instead, instruction No. 5, which is as follows: "In this case, gentlemen, the plaintiff is responsible only for such negligence, if any there was, that she was guilty of. She is not liable for any contributory negligence, if any there was, that may have been committed by her husband, who was the driver of the surrey. I will say, further, to you, that, if you believe from the evidence that the motorman discharged all of the duties of which I have spoken to you,—that is, that he did keep a lookout ahead, did have his car under reasonable control, did sound the customary signals, and did exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to the vehicle in which the plaintiff was riding,—but that the vehicle suddenly appeared upon the track that the street car was occupying, so close to the street car that the motorman could not avoid the accident by the exercise of ordinary care, then the law is for the defendant, and you should so find." And it is the action of the court in refusing to give instructions A and B, asked for, and in giving instruction No. 5, of which appellant now complains.

The evidence shows that appellee and her husband and two others were driving west on Frankfort avenue on Sunday afternoon, and a car of appellant company was going in the same direction, and, while the carriage in which appellee was riding was upon the west-bound track of appellant, its car ran into the vehicle from behind, overturned it, and threw them out, and appellee sustained the injury complained of. It is the contention of appellant that the horse which was being driven by appellee's husband became frightened at a passing railroad train, and swerved suddenly upon the track a short distance before the car, and when the car was so close upon it that the accident and collision were unavoidable. It is conceded for appellant that appellee did nothing whatever, and was a passive occupant of the carriage, and, unless the negligence of her husband (if any there was), as driver, can be imputed to her, then she is without fault, and must recover in any event, if those in charge of the car were shown to have been negligent of their duty. This presents the question squarely as to whether or not the negligence of a husband while driving a vehicle in which his wife is a passenger can be imputed to the wife, in an action for damages by her, and whether or not the relation of husband and wife is such as that the wife cannot recover under such circumstances if it is shown that the husband, with whom she was riding, was guilty of negligence. A somewhat similar question was raised in the case of Cahill v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 92 Ky. 345, 18 S. W. 2, where it was held that a person who was injured while riding in a vehicle at the invitation of the owner cannot have the contributory neglect of the owner, who was the driver, imputed to him, unless the relation of principal and agent or master and servant exist between the passenger and the owner of the vehicle. The principle announced in that case has been followed in a number of subsequent cases.

While admitting that the trend of this opinion is to the effect that the occupant of a vehicle is not chargeable with the contributory neglect of the driver thereof, unless the relation between them is that of principal and agent or master and servant, or such that the passenger has some authority and control or direction over the acts of the driver, appellant relies upon the case of Central Pass. R. Co. v. Chatterson, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 665, and the authority of numerous courts of last resort in other states, to support its contention that the contributory neglect of the husband is to be imputed to the wife, because of the marital relation. The case of Central Pass. R. Co. v. Chatterson was decided before the passage of the Weissinger act, and, as counsel for appellant correctly states, the doctrine of imputing the neglect of the husband to the wife did not arise at common law by reason of the fact of the husband's interest in his wife's estate, and of the further fact that the wife was not allowed to sue without joining her husband as a party plaintiff. Such was the rule in Kentucky prior to the passage of the Weissinger act, and necessarily "this question could not have arisen in Kentucky before the Weissinger act was passed." This being true, the Kentucky authority relied upon by appellant does not apply. In the Chatterson Case both husband and wife were joined as plaintiffs, and the court evidently regarded the driver as the agent and servant of both, and held that the jury should have been so instructed. Since the passage of the Weissinger act our court has not been called upon to pass upon this question; but, as above indicated, it is not a new one, but one which has been passed upon by most every state in the Union. An examination of the authorities shows that in many states the negligence of the husband in driving a vehicle is attributed to the wife, and she has been denied the right to recover. The supreme courts of Illinois, Texas, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Connecticut, and Massachusetts have so held; while, on the other hand, the supreme courts of the states of Indiana, New York, and Ohio, and numerous Federal authorities, hold that the negligence of the husband is not to be imputed to the wife, and that, even though he is negligent, she is not denied the right of recovery because thereof.

In the case of Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Creek, 130 Ind. 139, 14 L.R.A. 733, 29 N. E. 481, in passing upon a similar question, after commenting upon the right of one to recover for injuries sustained while riding in a carriage as the guest of the driver, the court said: "We can see no good reason why the foregoing statement may not apply to a wife riding with her husband with as much reason as to a stranger riding with him; nor why she may not be in such case a mere passive guest, without authority to direct or control his movements, and without reason to suspect his prudence or his skill. A husband and wife may undoubtedly sustain such relations to each other in a given case that the negligence of one will be imputed to the other. The mere existence of the marital relation, however, will not have that effect. In our opinion, there will be no more reason or justice in a rule that would, in cases of this character, inflict upon a wife the consequences of her husband's negligence solely and alone because of that relationship, than to hold her accountable at the bar of eternal justice for his sins because she was his wife." And in the case of Knightstown v. Musgrove, 116 Ind. 121, 9 Am. St. Rep. 827, 18 N. E. 452, the rule was thus stated: "Where the negligence of a driver is sought to be imputed to an occupant of the vehicle, it must be shown that the relation of the person injured to the one whose negligence contributed to the injury was such that, in contemplation of law, the negligent act of a third person was, upon the principle of agency or co-operation in a joint or common enterprise, the act of the person injured." And in the case of Honey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (C. C.) 59 Fed. 423, it was held that "to render the contributory negligence of a wife, regarded as the agent or servant of her husband, imputable to him, the circumstances must be such that he would be liable for her negligent act if it had resulted in injury to a third person."

It seems to us that this rule is in consonance with reason and justice; that the negligence of the husband or the wife, as the case may be, should not be attributable to or charged to the other, unless it should appear that in that particular instance the relation of principal and agent or master and servant existed between them. The mere fact that the one is the husband or the wife of the other should not render him or her answerable for the negligence of the other. Under the enlarged property rights which a married woman now enjoys, she may prosecute a suit in her own name for personal injury without joining her husband. The husband has no interest in the recovery, and we see no good reason for denying to a wife the right of recovery because her husband, into whose care she, for the time being, intrusted herself, was guilty of an act of negligence which contributed to bring about her injury. This was the wife's status at common law; but the purpose of all modern legislation, and the trend of judicial interpretation thereof, has been to give to married women, when dealing with their property rights, more and more freedom from the restraint, control, and dominion of their husbands, until now in Kentucky and in most states they may deal with the same, with few exceptions, as though they were unmarried. Hence the reason for the rule that, unless the relation of master and servant or principal and agent is made to appear in a particular case, the wife is not held chargeable with the negligent acts of her husband, and in cases where personal injury results from the concurrent negligence of the husband and a third party the negligence of the husband is not ordinarily attributable to the wife, so as to bar her right of recovery.

We are of opinion that the trial court did not err in refusing to give the instructions asked for by appellant, as the whole law of the case was embodied in the instructions given.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOE WOODS et al., Appts.,

v.

H. C. RINER, Admr., etc., of Sarah E. Woods, Deceased.

(— Ky. —, 113 S. W. 79.)

Insurance — insurable interest — child.

1. An adult son has an insurable interest in the life of his mother although he is not dependent upon her for support and has no direct pecuniary interest in her life.

Same — contract with stranger — effect.

2. That a son, in taking insurance on the life of his mother, contracts with a cousin to pay a portion of the premiums and share in the proceeds of the policy, does not invalidate the policy so far as the rights of the son are concerned.

(October 30, 1908.)

APPEAL by cross petitioners from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County denying them a portion of the relief claimed in a proceeding by the administrator of Sarah E. Woods, deceased, for advice as to the distribution of the proceeds of a policy of insurance on her life. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. J. Beard for appellants.

Case Note. — Insurable interest of adult child in life of parent.

The earlier cases upon the question of an adult child's insurable interest in a parent's life are collected in the note to Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill, 54 L.R.A. 225, which apparently is the last case expressly passing thereon prior to the decision in WOODS v. RINER.

Cases in which it does not appear whether the child was a minor or an adult are not included.

An adult son has not, from the bare fact of that relation, an insurable interest in the life of his father. Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill, 54 L.R.A. 225, 45 C. C. A. 641, 106 Fed. 800.

The mere existence of a law imposing upon a son the duty of supporting his father in case the latter becomes unable to support himself gives the son no insurable interest in the father's life, in the absence of any expenditures, past or prospective, towards such support. Ibid.

Ability on the part of the father to support his adult son in case of the latter's inability to support himself is necessary in order to give the son an insurable interest in the father's life, under a statute imposing upon fathers the duty of caring for their indigent children. Ibid.

As to the insurable interest of a minor child in its parent's life, see the note to Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill, 54 L.R.A. 225.

APPEAL by cross petitioners from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County denying them a portion of the relief claimed in a proceeding by the administrator of Sarah E. Woods, deceased, for advice as to the distribution of the proceeds of a policy of insurance on her life. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. J. Beard for appellants.

Case Note. — Insurable interest of adult child in life of parent.

The earlier cases upon the question of an adult child's insurable interest in a parent's life are collected in the note to Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill, 54 L.R.A. 225, which apparently is the last case expressly passing thereon prior to the decision in WOODS v. RINER.

An adult son has not, from the bare fact of that relation, an insurable interest in the life of his father. Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill, 54 L.R.A. 225, 45 C. C. A. 641, 106 Fed. 800.

The mere existence of a law imposing upon a son the duty of supporting his father in case the latter becomes unable to support himself gives the son no insurable interest in the father's life, in the absence of any expenditures, past or prospective, towards such support. Ibid.

Ability on the part of the father to support his adult son in case of the latter's inability to support himself is necessary in order to give the son an insurable interest in the father's life, under a statute imposing upon fathers the duty of caring for their indigent children. Ibid.

such interest as will support a policy by the one on the life of the other." Among the cases recognizing this doctrine may be cited the following: Valley Mut. Life Assn. v. Teewalt, 79 Va. 423; Reserve Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Kane, supra; Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Hazlewood, 75 Tex. 338, 7 L.R.A. 217, 16 Am. St. Rep. 893, 12 S. W. 621; Tucker v. Mutual Ben. Life Co. 121 N. Y. 718, 24 N. E. 1102; Trenton Mut. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 24 N. J. L. 576; Hilliard v. Sanford, 4 Ohio N. P. 363.

In speaking of the duties due from children to their parents, Blackstone (1 Lewis's ed. p. 428) says: "The duties of children to their parents arise from a principle of natural justice and retribution; for to those who gave us existence we naturally owe subjection and obedience during our minority, and honor and reverence ever after. They who protected the weakness of our infancy are entitled to our protection in the infirmity of their age. They who, by sustenance and education, have enabled the offspring to prosper, ought in return to be supported by that offspring in case they stand in need of assistance. Upon this principle proceed all the duties of children to their parents, which are enjoined by positive laws." It may be safely said that no relationship in life, arising from ties of blood, is more sacred or more binding than that of parent and child. As the mother looks into the eyes of her child and uses every effort to guard it from harm and prolong its life, so the child as maturity comes raises a strong arm to protect her in her old age, and looks with fear to the time when she will be taken away. Thus every common instinct, to say nothing of love and affection, makes each interested in the long life of the other. With such a tie uniting parent and child, we cannot accede to the doctrine that some pecuniary loss or disadvantage must result to the son from the death of his mother in order that he may be interested in the continuation of her life. We therefore conclude that the relationship between parent and child is of itself sufficient to give either an insurable interest in the life of the other, and that no other element is required.

Nor do we think the fact that appellants entered into a contract with George T. Woods, by which he was to furnish one third of the premiums and to share in one third of the proceeds of the policy, had the effect of invalidating the policy so far as the appellants are concerned. This precise question was before this court in the case of Beard v. Sharp, supra. There the son had for a number of years paid the premium on the policy of insurance on the life of his mother issued for his benefit. After paying several premiums, he caused a new certificate to be issued, making himself and a stranger joint beneficiaries, the stranger agreeing to pay the premiums. This court held that the son was entitled to the whole amount of the proceeds of the policy, less the premiums paid by the stranger, with the interest thereon, and further held that the insurance was not invalidated by the designation of a person prohibited by law from being a beneficiary. Indeed, it may be said to be the general rule that a contract of insurance in not invalidated by the designation of a person prohibited by law to be a beneficiary. Caudell v. Woodward, 96 Ky. 646, 29 S. W. 614; Weigelman v. Bronger, 96 Ky. 132, 28 S. W. 334; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924.

Being of the opinion that Sarah E. Woods was mentally capable of contracting, and that no fraud was practised, either upon her or appellees herein, in securing the contract of insurance, that the subsequent contract made by appellants with George T. Woods did not affect the validity of the policy, or appellants' interest therein, and that the relationship existing between appellants and their mother was sufficient, in and of itself, to give them an insurable interest in her life, we therefore conclude that appellants are entitled to the whole proceeds of the policy.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion.

ROBERT GOWDY.

(199 Mass. 568, 85 N. E. 884.)

Sidewalk — casting water — liability.

1. A property owner who throws water from his roof, by means of a spout, onto his walk in such a manner that by the natural slant it flows to a public walk, where it freezes and renders the walk unsafe, is liable for injuries thereby caused to a pedestrian who is himself in the exercise of due care.

Note. — As to the liability of abutting property owner for injury caused by ice formed from water artificially turned across sidewalk, see note to Brown v. White, 58 L.R.A. 321, and supplementary case note to Hynes v. Brewer, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598.

Same — liability of abutting owner — contributory defect.

2. That a town has negligently left a depression in a sidewalk will not relieve from liability for injuries to a pedestrian who falls on ice there accumulated, the abutting owner who negligently turns water collected from his roof onto the walk, and thereby contributes to the injury.

Same — notice.

3. A property owner who, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, has reasonable notice that water from his roof, in conjunction with any other cause, produces a dangerous condition upon a public sidewalk, is responsible for the injury thereby caused.

Same — municipal ordinance — evidence.

4. A municipal ordinance forbidding any person to permit water from his eaves to be discharged upon the sidewalk, or to permit any conduit upon his land to discharge water upon the sidewalk, is not immaterial upon the question of the negligence of the property owner who cast water from his own roof upon his own walk in such a manner that it flowed naturally upon the sidewalk.

Appeal — evidence — exclusion — error.

5. The exclusion, in an action against a property owner for injuries to a pedestrian falling on a sidewalk because of the alleged freezing of water turned from his roof onto the walk, of a photograph of the direction taken by water coming from the roof during a severe rainstorm, is not so plainly wrong that it will be interfered with by the reviewing court.

Messrs. R. J. Morrissey, J. B. Carroll, and W. H. McClintock, for plaintiff:

The condition was dangerous to public travel, constituting a nuisance.

The conductor constituted a nuisance, and it was none the less so because some of the water lodged in the depression; and the fact that the town was also negligent does not excuse the defendant.

Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort by the plaintiff, a traveler upon a public sidewalk, against the defendant, an abutting landowner, for collecting water from his roof and conducting it through a spout to his own walk, whence it flowed by natural slant to the public walk and froze, so that the plaintiff, while walking with due care after dark on a December day, slipped and was injured.

1. The refusal of the trial judge to rule that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover was correct. There was evidence that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. A landowner has a right to change the surface of his lot, or improve it by the construction of buildings or by other means, in any lawful manner, and, if the natural course of surface water is thereby altered, no liability is imposed on him. But he has no right to collect water into a definite channel by a spout or otherwise and pour it upon a public way. If he does this, and, through the operation of natural causes, the water freezes, he is the efficient cause in the creation of a nuisance, and is liable for whatever damage ensues as a probable consequence. Cavanagh v. Block, 192 Mass. 63, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 310, 116 Am. St. Rep. 220, 77 N. E. 1027; Hynes v. Brewer, 194 Mass. 435, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 598, 80 N. E. 503; Leahan v. Cochran, 178 Mass. 566, 53 L.R.A. 891, 86 Am.

St. Rep. 506, 60 N. E. 382. There was evidence tending to show that from two spouts on the defendant's house, one about 11 feet from the street line, and the other nearer by the width of a piazza, water was collected from the roof and turned upon his concrete walk, and by the natural grade of the walk flowed to the sidewalk, where it froze in a ridge across the width of the public walk about 3 inches in thickness in the middle. This was sufficient to warrant a finding that the defendant collected the surface water in an artificial course and poured it upon the public way in such a manner as to create a nuisance. Moore v. Gadsden, 87 N. Y. 84, 41 Am. Rep. 352, is distinguishable on the ground that no water was there collected in a definite channel; that falling upon the lot was permitted to flow according to gravity without being gathered.

2. There was evidence from which it was argued that there was a depression or gully in the sidewalk, into which the water from the defendant's spout flowed and froze. Upon this aspect the defendant asked for rulings, in substance, that the plaintiff could not recover if the water would have run off but for the defect in the sidewalk, and that the defendant, in maintaining his premises, was not obliged to take into account the effect of this condition. This request was refused, and the jury instructed that, if the defendant materially contributed to the cause of the defect which occasioned the plaintiff's injury, he would not be excused because some other cause also contributed; and that, if the defendant's conductor was a nuisance, and water from it froze on the sidewalk, so as to be dangerous, the defendant would be liable, even if the sidewalk was otherwise dangerous. No error is here disclosed. The town and the defendant were not joint tortfeasors in producing the dangerous condition of the sidewalk, which resulted in the plaintiff's injury, yet, if each contributed an efficient causal factor, either may be liable. Mooney v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 185 Mass. 547, 70 N. E. 933; Lowell v. Glidden, 159 Mass. 317, 34 N. E. 459; Boston v. Coon, 175 Mass. 283, 56 N. E. 287. A landowner, in turning water upon a public way, is bound to take into account its actual condition, and determine at his peril whether his act in conjunction with the way, as it exists from time to time, will create a nuisance. A defect in a highway, when bare, may be so conjoined with snow or ice that both together may operate as a proximate cause to which an injury may be attributed. Newton v. Worcester, 174 Mass. 181, 187, 54 N. E. 521. An abutting landowner can no more rely upon perfection of conduct in the public officers having charge of highways than upon like conduct in an individual to shield himself from the consequences of his own tortious act. If both are wrongdoers and both contribute to the injury as a cause, each may be liable, though there is no concert of action. Corey v. Havenner, 182 Mass. 250, 65 N. E. 69. The verdict of the jury has established the fact of the defendant's wrongdoing. Even though this wrongful act alone may not have been a sufficient cause for the plaintiff's injury, but, working concurrently with another wrongful act of a third person, both being efficient causes, the harm is occasioned to the plaintiff, either may be liable. Feneff v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 575, 82 N. E. 705. In the requests of the defendant, the concurrent operation of two causal wrongful agencies in the creation of the dangerous situation was omitted, and they were properly refused, while the instructions given conformed to the law. The defendant has argued in his brief that there was no evidence as to the length of time the defect in the sidewalk had existed; but that point does not appear to have been raised at the trial, and the portion of the charge dealing with it is not reported. It is now too late to raise the question. The defense was apparently directed to the point that water from the spouts did not flow over the sidewalk. If the defendant had, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, reasonable notice that his storm water, in conjunction with any other cause, produced a dangerous condition, he is responsible. Davis v. Rich, 180 Mass. 235, 62 N. E. 375.

4. There was admitted in evidence, subject to the defendant's exception, a by-law of the town of Westfield that "no person shall permit water from the eaves or leader pipes of any building owned or cared for by him to be discharged upon the sidewalk . . . or make or permit any drain, sluice, gully, or conduit upon his land to discharge water upon the sidewalk." It is contended that there was no evidence of a violation of this by-law, and that hence it should have been excluded. Its language does not prohibit alone direct and immediate discharge without any intervening agency, but includes as well cases where the house, standing back from the street line, is so fitted with eaves and leader pipes that the collected waters flow with accelerated volume and directed force to the highway. The walk of the defendant may have been found to act as a trough to carry the water from the spout to the sidewalk. There being some evidence of the violation of the by-law, it was competent evidence, to be considered with all the other circumstances, as bearing upon the liability of the defendant, although not conclusively establishing it. McCarthy v. Morse, 197 Mass. 332, 83 N. E. 1109. The defendant's request for instruction upon this branch of the case did not accurately state the law as applicable to the language of the by-law and the other circumstances, and was properly refused. The by-law was not offered for the purpose of establishing a duty on the part of the defendant, violation of which was the sole foundation of the plaintiff's action. The existence of a nuisance cannot be predicated solely upon violation of a municipal ordinance when the act prohibited is in itself indifferent and no duty exists apart from the ordinance. Dahlin v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 103, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 615, 77 N. E. 830. But there was independent affirmative testimony of the tortious act of the defendant in turning the water upon the sidewalk, which subsequently congealed and injured the plaintiff. That this act, which might have been found wrongful in itself, was also a violation of a by-law, was a circumstance to be weighed with all other evidence bearing upon the issue. Finnegan v. Winslow Skate Mfg. Co. 189 Mass. 580, 76 N. E. 102; Newcomb v. Boston Protective Department, 146 Mass. 596, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 555; Glassey v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 185 Mass. 315, 70 N. E. 199. See Doherty v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 241, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816, 83 N. E. 677.

5. The defendant, having offered to show that, since the accident to the plaintiff, there had been no change in any of the material facts on the face of the earth, proffered a photograph taken in the course of the trial during a rainstorm of much greater severity than any occurring near the time of the accident, for the purpose of showing the direction taken by water thrown from the spout, and after it reached the defendant's walk, and that such water could not and did not flow to the public walk. To the exclusion of this evidence the defendant excepted. The ground of this ruling is not stated. A photograph of the place, when there was no storm, was admitted in evidence. That excluded was at best a photograph of an experiment. A photograph has no higher character as evidence than the experiment itself. Whether the conditions were sufficiently similar to make the observation of any value in aiding the jury to pass upon the issue submitted to them was primarily for the trial judge to determine as a matter of discretion. His decision in this respect will not be interfered with unless plainly wrong. Such observations and experiments, though sometimes admitted, have often been excluded, in the discretion of the presiding judge. There is nothing in the present case to show that the exclusion of the photograph was error. Farrell v. Weitz, 160 Mass. 288, 35 N. E. 793; Dow v. Bulfinch, 192 Mass. 281, 78 N. E. 416; Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 478, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1056, 76 N. E. 127; Baker v. Harrington, 196 Mass. 339, 82 N. E. 33. The other exceptions were either waived, or were not argued and are treated as waived.

Exceptions overruled.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

JAMES FITZGERALD, Admr., etc., of George H. Fitzgerald,
v.

WORCESTER & SOUTHBRIDGE STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(200 Mass. 105, 85 N. E. 911.)

Master — negligence — rules.

1. It may be found to be negligence for a street car company to fail to take precautions against the forgetting or misunderstanding of an order which requires a regular car to await the arrival of a special one before proceeding out on the track, where the result of its nonobservance may be death; and so, where the custom is to notify the conductor and motorman of the regular car of the order, and to post it on the bulletin, failure to comply with the custom may be found to be negligence.

Same — superintendent — statutory liability — car despatcher.

2. A car despatcher to whom is confided the management of cars on a street railway is an employee intrusted with and exercising superintendence, and whose sole and principal duty is that of superintendence, within the meaning of a statute rendering the employer responsible for the negligence of such person.

Negligence — intervening cause — forgetfulness.

3. The forgetting by a conductor of a street car of a verbal order to await the arrival of a special car before taking his car out on the track is not such an immediate and sole cause of an injury resulting from a collision of the two cars as to relieve the company from liability because of its negligence in failing to notify the motorman of the car of the order, and post it on the bulletin according to custom.

Case Note. — Failure to reduce to writing orders, governing the running of trains or cars.

There are but few cases in which the failure to reduce orders governing the running of trains or cars to writing is one of the essential factors; and a search reveals none in which it appears, as in the foregoing case, that the failure to reduce the orders to writing was relied upon to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

In one or two cases, the question is raised whether or not it was negligence on the R EPORT by the Superior Court of Worcester County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after directing a verdict in defendant's favor of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles M. Thayer and J. Otis Sibley, for plaintiff:

Deceased had the right to assume that the defendant's agents would perform their duties in accordance with the rules, or with the usual customs as sanctioned by the defendant.

Carroll v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 182 Mass. 240, 65 N. E. 69; Rafferty v. Nawn, 182 Mass. 503, 65 N. E. 830; Edgar v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 188 Mass. 420, 74 N. E. 911; Meadowcroft v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 193 Mass. 249, 79 N. E. 266.

The defendant was responsible for the negligence of the train despatcher.

Doe v. Boston & W. Street R. Co. 195 Mass. 168, 80 N. E. 814; Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 2 Am. St. Rep. 631, 11 Atl. 514; Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 62, 39 Am. Rep. 627; Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L.R.A. 396, 40 Am. St. Rep. 616, 37 N. E. 466; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590.

The custom to notify both a motorman part of the injured employee, or on the part of one of his fellow servants, to run a train or car on verbal orders, where he or the fellow servant knew that the rules called for written orders.

Thus, in Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 359, 1 Am. St. Rep. 729, 4 S. W. 129, it was held that, admitting or assuming that the train despatcher was the representative of the railroad, and by his negligence the accident occurred, the fact that the engineer took an engine out upon the despatcher's verbal orders, although he knew that written orders were required by the rules, would not prevent a recovery for injuries received by his fireman.

And in Doe v. Boston & W. Street R. Co. 195 Mass. 168, 80 N. E. 814, it appeared that the conductor and motorman of a trolley car should not, under the rules of the company, have left a certain switch without a written order,—that is, an order written out by the conductor who received it by telephone,—until a certain car going in the opposite direction had passed. They, however, received a telephone order from the despatcher to proceed, and their car collided with the approaching car. The court held that the defendant would be liable for the injuries received notwithstanding the negligence of the conductor and motorman in not taking the order down in writing.

The court said: "If the collision which followed would not have been caused if the conductor and the motorman had observed these rules, yet that such a result was probable should have been anticipated from the knowledge and experience of the train despatcher under whose order the car proceeded. He was called upon, before giving this order, to take every reasonable precaution to ascertain whether three cars had passed; and, if he failed to ascertain this important fact, his negligence could have been found to have been the efficient cause of the disaster."

In Deverson v. Eastern R. Co. 58 N. H. 129, it was held that the fact that the plaintiff, an engineer on defendant's road, did not reduce to writing, as required by the rules, certain telegrams announcing a breakdown of his engine, was not a legal bar to a recovery for injuries received by him for a failure on the part of the defendant properly to keep the track clear for his disabled engine; but the jury might consider this fact as bearing upon his contributory negligence.

Carroll v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 182 Mass. 237, 65 N. E. 69; Edgar v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. and Meadowcroft v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra; Brady v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 184 Mass. 225, 68 N. E. 227; Nagle v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 188 Mass. 38, 73 N. E. 1019.

The failure of the despatcher to notify the motorman was negligence.

Labatt, Mast. & S. § 16a; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 223, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952; Gerrish v. New Haven Ice Co. 63 Conn. 9, 27 Atl. 235; Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 139 N. Y. 302, 34 N. E. 918.

If the jury could have found that the order was given negligently, the defendant would have been liable for the result of such negligence.

Devine v. Boston & A. R. Co. 159 Mass. 348, 34 N. E. 539; Prendible v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co. 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675; O'Brien v. West End Street R. Co. 173 Mass. 105, 53 N. E. 149; Eaves v. The failure of a servant to perform such a duty delegated by his principal is the failure of the principal.

Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506; Wheeler v.

Wason Mfg. Co. 135 Mass. 294; Jarvis v. Coes Wrench Co. 177 Mass. 170, 58 N. E. 587; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burgess, 47 C. C. A. 168, 108 Fed. 26.

The probable and natural result of a violation of the customary precautionary rules, or of complying with them negligently, would be collision; and such result might well have been foreseen; and for the probable and natural result of its acts the defendant is liable.

Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Derry v. Flitner, 118 Mass. 131; Stone v. Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 41 L.R.A. 794, 51 N. E. 1; Koplan v. Boston Gaslight Co. 177 Mass. 15, 58 N. The deceased did not assume the risk that the officers of the defendant would not perform their duties and obey the rules.

Messrs. Charles C. Milton, Chandler Bullock, and F. H. Dewey for defendant.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the conscious suffering and death of George H. Fitzgerald, who, in August, 1907, was a motorman in the defendant's employ.

By the defendant's regular schedule, it was Fitzgerald's duty to run a car each week day, with one Campbell as conductor, from Charlton to Worcester, starting from the car barn in Charlton at 5:45 A. M. On the evening of August 28th, Fitzgerald and Campbell received a verbal order from one Kingdon, the defendant's car despatcher, to run their car as a special car from Charlton to Southbridge and return before starting their regular trip from Charlton to Worcester at 5:45 A. M. The order was to start from the Charlton car barn at 5:05 A. M., go to Southbridge, leave Southbridge on the return trip at 5:27 A. M., passing two cars at the optical works (in Southbridge), "then right of way to the car barn and then on regular schedule," to quote from the testimony of Campbell.

return trip. There was evidence that, when they were within one and one-half minutes or two minutes of Charlton they were run into by a car which, by the regular schedule, left Charlton for Southbridge at 5:45 A. M., the same minute at which, by the same schedule, Fitzgerald's and Campbell's car was to leave Charlton for Worcester; that Fitzgerald first saw this car when it was about 200 feet away, as he came around a curve at full speed (from 20 to 25 miles an hour); that he did all in his power to stop his car, but that, in spite of this, the other car (an open one) "mounted" his car (a closed one) and he was caught before he could get out of the way.

Whether Fitzgerald and Campbell were behind time on the one hand, or, on the other hand, whether the other car started before the schedule time, was not clear on the evidence, and is not important. There was evidence that the car despatcher told the conductor of this other car "to wait at the car barn until he had seen us [Fitzgerald and Campbell] go by," to quote again from Campbell's testimony.

One Farquhar was the motorman of this other car, which, by the regular schedule, was to leave Charlton for Southbridge at 5:45 A. M.

It appeared that the car despatcher's office was at the defendant's car barn at Oxford.

It happened that Kingdon, the car despatcher, Fitzgerald and Campbell (the motorman and conductor of the car which ran as a special car to Southbridge with the right of way on its return trip to Charlton), and Smith (the conductor of the regular car leaving Charlton for Southbridge and running against the special car if it left Charlton before that car arrived there) were at a reception at Webster on the evening of August 28th, and that all the orders given by Kingdon, the car despatcher, were given there by word of mouth. Farquhar (the motorman of this other car) was not at the reception, and received no order or notice in the matter. This reception was given to one Anderson, the superintendent of the defendant's railway, who was leaving its employ, and was attended by some 18 to 20 employees.

The plaintiff introduced evidence from which the jury were warranted in finding that it was the general custom of the defendant corporation to notify both the conductor and the motorman of a regular car which is to wait for a special car, and also to post all orders for special cars which conflict with the regular schedule on a bulletin board hung under the clock in the motormen's and conductors' lobby in the Charlton street car barn.

Where the result of an employee's forgetting an order is not of serious consequence, an employer's duty is performed if the proper order is given clearly by word of mouth to one employee. But, where life or death hangs on an order's being executed as given, no chances should be taken. It might well be found in such a case to be an act of negligence if precautions were not taken against the order's being forgotten or misunderstood.

The general custom of the defendant's road (which was testified to in the case at bar) required such precautions to be taken in giving an order of that kind. That general custom testified to was to notify the motorman as well as the conductor of the regular car which was to wait for the special car, and to post such an order on the bulletin board in the motormen's and conductors' lobby in the car barn from which the regular car was to start.

In the case at bar the plaintiff waived all but two counts of the declaration. In both of these the plaintiff counted on "the negligence of employees of the defendant who were intrusted with and were exercising superintendence and whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence." His contention is that the negligence of a car despatcher is the negligence of an employee of the defendant, who was intrusted with and was exercising superintendence.

The plaintiff was right in this contention. It was decided in Doe v. Boston & W. Street R. Co. 195 Mass. 168, 80 N. E. 814, that a car despatcher to whom is confided the management of cars on the tracks of a street railway is an employee intrusted with and exercising superintendence, and whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, within Rev. Laws, chap. 106, § 71, cl. 2. See also, in this connection, Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, 25 L.R.A. 396, 40 Am. St. Rep. 616, 37 N. E. 466; Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 2 Am. St. Rep. 631, 11 Atl. 514; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 500.

From what has been said the jury were warranted in finding that Kingdon was negligent in not giving the order to Farquhar, the motorman of the regular car, as well as to Smith, the conductor of it, to wait in the car barn until the special car had passed, and in not posting that order on the bulletin board.

The defendant has made the further contention that the cause of the accident here in question, and the sole cause of it, was Smith's having forgotten the order which the evidence shows was given to him by Kingdon by word of mouth; and for that reason that the case comes within Stone v. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 41 L.R.A. 794, 51 N. E. 1; Glassey v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 185 Mass. 315, 70 N. E. 199, and Higgins v. Higgins, 188 Mass. 113, 74 N. E. 471.

But the reasons which make it the duty of the employer or his superintendent (in such a case as that now before us) to take precautions against an order being forgotten or misunderstood make the failure to do that a proximate cause of the accident if an order verbally given to the conductor alone is forgotten and an accident occurs.

In this event, by the terms of the report, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for $5,000, with interest and costs. But, since the $2,500 for which a verdict is given in the first count goes to different persons from those to whom the $2,500 for which a verdict is given in the second count should be paid, we construe the report to mean that the verdict entered for the defendant should be set aside, that a judgment for $2,500 is to be entered on each count, as of the date of the trial; and that judgment should carry interest from the date of the verdict, with one set of costs.

So ordered.

HORACE V. YOUNG

v.

GEORGE H. SNELL.

(200 Mass. 242, 86 N. E. 282.)

Evidence — sufficiency — defect.

1. Proof of the existence of a nail projecting from the floor near a machine a week after an employee stumbles over something at that point and falls into the machine to his injury will justify a finding that it was there at the time of, and was the cause of, the accident.

Case Note. — Master's Liability for injuries sustained by servant from falling over nail or bolt projecting from floor.

The case of Jennings v. Tompkins, cited by the court in YOUNG v. SNELL, was not a master and servant case.

The only case similar in its facts to the above case is Taylor v. Penn. Steel Castings & Mach. Co. 217 Pa. 269, 66 Atl. 353, which holds that a servant cannot recover for injuries sustained in consequence of stumbling over a bolt which projected from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch above the floor, and thereby falling into an open elevator shaft, where such bolt was necessary to sustain weighing scales which it was the servant's duty to use, as the danger therefrom was obvious and fully known to him.

Same — defect — notice.

2. That, upon examination of the place at which an employee stumbled and fell into a machine to his injury, a nail was found projecting from the floor, will justify a finding that a proper inspection before the accident would have disclosed its presence to the employer.

Master — unsafe working place.

3. An employer may be liable for an injury to his employee through his fall into a machine by stumbling over a nail projecting from the floor near the machine, which is concealed by the litter on the floor.

Same — fellow servant — negligence.

4. An accident to an employee who stumbles over a nail projecting from the floor and falls into a machine cannot be said to have been caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in failing to remove the litter from the floor, where there is nothing to show that he had neglected to remove it when his duty required him to do so.

Same — contributory negligence.

5. A workman is not negligent per se in walking toward a machine in motion without sweeping the litter from the floor to ascertain if it contains projections which may cause him to stumble and fall into the machine.

Same — assumption of risk.

6. A workman does not assume the risk of injury by being thrown into a machine by falling over a nail projecting from the floor, where it is habitually covered with litter so that the risk from it is not obvious.

(November 24, 1908.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Bristol County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick S. Hall, for plaintiff:

It was the defendant's duty to use due diligence to discover defects, and the duration of those defects may be considered as bearing on such diligence.

2 Thomas, Neg. p. 1392; Walton v. Ensign, 27 Ohio C. C. 505.

If there are facts from which a reasonable inference of negligence may be drawn, there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

Cleveland Terminal & Valley R. Co. v. Marsh, 63 Ohio St. 236, 52 L.R.A. 142, 58 N. E. 821; Northern Mill. Co. v. Mackey, 99 Ill. App. 57; Dixey v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 180 Pa. 401, 36 Atl. 924; Corbin v. Western Electric Co. 78 Ill. App. 516.

Mr. D. F. Slade, for defendant:

The plaintiff was, as a matter of law, bound to exercise caution in approaching these dangers.

Ford v. Mt. Tom Sulphite Pulp Co. 172 Mass. 544, 48 L.R.A. 96, 52 N. E. 1065; May v. Whittier Mach. Co. 154 Mass. 29, 27 N. E. 768.

The plaintiff assumed the risk incident to his employment.

Kanz v. Page, 168 Mass. 217, 46 N. E. 620.

The presence of the nail was one of those temporary dangers which the employers could not reasonably guard against; and, considering the use to which the room was being put, it could not be said that the defendant was called upon, in the exercise of due diligence, to know of its presence.

McCann v. Kennedy, 167 Mass. 23, 44 N. E. 1055; Donovan v. American Linen Co. 180 Mass. 127, 61 N. E. 808.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was hired by the defendant to put up an addition to his planing mill about six weeks before the accident here complained of. He testified that he was invited by the defendant to use the machinery in the mill whenever he had work to be done which could be done more quickly on one of the machines. On the day in question he had occasion to square up a piece of quarter round board, and undertook to use the defendant's buzz planer in doing that work. His story was that he found that he did not have the right gauge on; that he went and set the gauge; that he then "went to pick up" the board in question, when something caught his foot and "caused him to stumble" onto the buzz planer which was exposed, and parts of two of his fingers were cut off by the machine. He was alone in the room at the time, and he testified that "it was not light around the machine and you could not see the floor around the machine; that there were a good many shavings on the floor; that these were directly under his feet and all around the planer." The accident was on a Monday.

He further testified that, a week later, he went to the place with another carpenter who never had worked for the defendant, and found a nail sticking up "about 1 inch or more" above the floor, and about 18 inches from the bottom of the planer; "that it was where it came directly in the way of his right foot." He described the nail as "hooked over, the head of it," and "that the head of it was towards him as he stood there working on the machine;" that he saw an "impression in the floor" which indicated that the nail had been in the board; "that the depression looked old" and "the nail looked old;" it had been worn slightly; the nail was not there in the depression, but was sticking up from it; the depression was about the same length as the part of the nail which stuck up from the floor, and the nail seemed to fit it. When he went there a week after the accident and found the nail, "he took a stick and brushed the shavings away and found the nail." The depression showed where the head of the nail had been driven into the wood.

The story of finding the nail was corroborated by the testimony of the carpenter who went with the plaintiff when he went to the factory a week after the accident, as has just been stated. He (the carpenter) testified to the shavings, to brushing them aside, and finding the nail. He saw that the nail "was sticking up an inch to an inch and $\frac{3}{4}$." He also corroborated the plaintiff's story as to the place where the nail was found, adding, "it was sort of a bad place for it," and, as to the nail being bent over, he testified that it "looked as if it was stamped on;" that it looked to him as if the nail had been tramped on some around there;" that the nail head was bent over; that "the nail was loose in the floor, in the hole in the floor, from being tramped on; that there was a depression under the head of the nail;" "that the nail did not look very new."

The plaintiff's story as to what the nail looked like was further corroborated by one Fitch, who was an employee of the defendant. His testimony confirmed the story told by the plaintiff as to where the nail was, as to its sticking up from the floor, as to its being bent over, and as to the depression in the floor. He also testified "that it appeared to be a nail that had worked itself out of the floor, or had been driven in the floor and tipped over by working around by the tramping on it; that it looked like a nail after it was scraped some on the side by the feet of anyone there and loosened out of the wood which kind of bent over the head of it; that it looked as if it had been tramped down in the floor as a nail naturally would be that had been tramped on the floor;" and "that the floor was all worn there; that it was worn up under the edge of the planer."

One of the defendant's employees called by the defendant testified that his attention was called to the nail by the plaintiff. He said that the nail was $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches long, and "that about $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch or $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch" of it only "was in the floor." His testimony corroborated that of the plaintiff as to where the nail was, as to the nail being bent over, as to its being "worn some" and "shiny," "that it showed shiny in a part of it where it had been struck by the feet," and "that it was not a new nail." He also testified that between the time of the accident and the time the plaintiff found the nail he did not do any cleaning "as far as he could remember."

There was evidence that the floor about the buzz planer was habitually covered with shavings, and that these shavings were usually cleaned up once a week on Saturday night, and that it was the duty of the last witness to clean up the shavings at that time.

There was some evidence which tended to contradict what might be inferred from the testimony of the plaintiff and his witnesses. It is not necessary to state what it was, for, even if not contradicted, the jury could disbelieve it in toto. Lindenbaum v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 197 Mass. 314, 84 N. E. 129.

The case does not come within Jennings v. Tompkins, 180 Mass. 302, 62 N. E. 265. The nail in the case at bar (if the plaintiff's story was believed) was bent over so as to make a person stumble, and was in such a position with reference to the buzz planer as to make its existence a source of great danger. In addition, the jury were warranted in finding that it stood up above the floor from an inch to an inch and $\frac{3}{4}$ in place of $\frac{3}{16}$ of an inch, as in Jennings v. Tompkins.

It is not an infrequent occurrence that the condition in which the locus is found after an accident is of itself alone sufficient evidence of its having been in the same condition before the accident. In Comerford v. Boston, 187 Mass. 564, 73 N. E. 661, the plaintiff was injured by the sidewalk having settled down about 2 inches below the curbing. There was evidence that, after the accident, the facing of the inside of the curbing was "pretty nigh black." This was held sufficient evidence that the sidewalk had been in this condition such a length of time before the accident that the city, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, might have known of it in season to have it remedied, within Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 52, § 18 (Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 18).

In Gould v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 396, 77 N. E. 712, a seat in an open car fell on the plaintiff by the breaking of the metallic armature. Evidence that, after the accident, half of the break of the armature was rusty, black, and corroded was held to be evidence that the crack was an old one, and would have been seen on inspection if due care had been used by the defendant.

Hannan v. American Steel & Wire Co. 193 Mass. 127, 78 N. E. 749, is another case of the same kind. There an injury was caused by the breaking of an iron bolt, and, after the accident, it was found that part of the break was fresh and the other part rusty. It was held that the condition in which the bolt was found to be after the accident warranted a finding that it was an old flaw which could have been found had proper inspection been made by the defendant, in the exercise of due care.

In our opinion the case at bar comes within these decisions, and the evidence here warranted the jury in finding that the nail found by the plaintiff a week after the accident was there before it and was the cause of it; and that, on proper inspection, it would have been found by the defendant. Further, in our opinion this is not the case of a transitory risk, as in Donovan v. American Linen Co. 180 Mass. 127, 61 N. E. 808, and McCann v. Kennedy, 167 Mass. 23, 44 N. E. 1055.

Neither was the accident caused by the neglect of a fellow servant in not sweeping up the shavings. On the uncontradicted testimony, the shavings were to be swept up but once a week. There is no evidence that they were not swept up on the Saturday night preceding the Monday on which the accident occurred. The shavings around the planer at the time of the accident might well have been made on that Monday morning. The case therefore does not come within McRea v. Hood Rubber Co. 187 Mass. 328, 72 N. E. 1015.

We are also of opinion that the jury were warranted in finding that the accident was not caused by contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. They were warranted in finding that the nail was hidden by shavings at the time of the accident. In our opinion a workman cannot be said, as matter of law, to be guilty of negligence if he walks to a buzz planer over a floor covered by shavings, without sweeping them away and examining the condition of the floor.

Since the floor was habitually covered with shavings, the risk from this nail was not an obvious one, and, for that reason, was not one assumed by the plaintiff as an incident to the employment which he chose to accept.

In accordance with the terms of the report the entry must be—Judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

SARAH MAYER

v.

IGNATZ MAYER, Appt.

(— Mich. —, 117 N. W. 890.)

Foreign judgment — alimony — enforcement.

1. The courts of one state may enforce a decree of another state for alimony payable in instalments where no power to 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

change the decree is reserved by the court or conferred by statute.

Same — support of minors — right to modify.

2. The courts of one state may not enforce payment of arrears under a decree of another state directing one party to a divorce suit to pay the other a certain amount per month for support of the children where the court reserved the right to modify the order in regard to the children at any time.

Contempt — disobedience of judgment — statutory provision.

3. Statutory authority to punish by imprisonment disobedience of an order for payment of alimony, made in any suit for divorce, does not extend to the authorization of such punishment for noncompliance with a decree directing payment of money due under a foreign decree for alimony.

(October 5, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Wayne County in Chancery directing him to comply with a foreign judgment for the payment of alimony and punishing him for contempt for refusal to do so. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frazer, Griswold, & Slyfield, for appellant:

The decree is a nullity because an action is not maintainable on a decree of a court of a sister state for alimony till the court which rendered it has first fixed the specific amount due.

Byers*, 110 Mich. 109, 67 N. W. 1067.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant and defendant were formerly husband and wife. On the 20th of April, 1896, the district court of the fifth district of Oklahoma passed a decree dissolving the marriage between the parties, and awarding the custody of five minor children of the parties to the defendant upon the following terms and conditions: "The said children are to be sent to the public schools during the school year, and said children are not to be sent out to work unless by permission of the court or judge. The plaintiff is to have 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the right to visit the said children at their home between the hours of 9 A. M. and 9 P. M. on Wednesdays and Saturdays of each week without interference or molestation from the defendant, the court reserving the right to modify the order in regard to the children at any time." The decree further adjudged that the complainant should pay to defendant as alimony for the support of herself the sum of $25 per month, payable monthly, such payments to cease on defendant's death or in case defendant should marry. The decree then proceeds as follows: "It is further ordered that the plaintiff pay to the defendant for the support and maintenance of the children the sum of $10 per month for each of said children, payable to the defendant monthly, said payments to continue until each of the said children shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one (21) years, or shall have married, or until the further order of the court. As a condition precedent to the payment of alimony by the plaintiff, the defendant is required to turn over to the plaintiff his books, literary and professional, also the instruments of his profession now being in the possession of the defendant, also his private papers, pictures, and photographs; and the plaintiff may withhold the payment of said alimony until this order is complied with, the cost of packing and shipping to be paid by the plaintiff." The complainant, who was the defendant in the divorce proceedings, afterwards removed to New York, and the defendant removed to the city of Detroit, in this state, and complainant later also removed to the city of Detroit and filed the bill in this case, which sets up, in substance, that she has substantially complied with all the terms of the decree on her part, but that the defendant has failed to make payments of the amount of alimony due to complainant of $25 per month, that he has failed to keep up the payments awarded to her for the care and support of the children, and that there is now due on each item a large sum of money. The circuit judge found that there was unpaid to complainant for her support at the date of the decree $1,700.50, and that there was unpaid to complainant of the sums which she was entitled to receive for the support of the children $3,172.34, and gave a decree for the total amount of $4,872.84, payable forthwith. The decree not having been complied with, upon proper proceedings had, the defendant was adjudged guilty of contempt for failure to comply with the decree, and an appeal has been taken to this court from the original decree, and also from the order adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt; and the questions involved in both orders are before the court for determination.

The case presents three questions: First, whether a decree for alimony made in a court of a sister state, where no reservation of a right to modify the decree appears in the decree itself, and where no such right is conferred upon the court by statute, is such a final determination of the rights of the parties as to create an obligation enforceable in our courts; second, whether the award of money for the care and support of the children, as in this case, where there is a reservation in the decree of a right to modify or change the order, either in the statute or in the decree itself, is such a final decree or order as is enforceable in the courts of this state; and, third, whether, if such decree is either wholly or in part enforceable within this state, it may be enforced by proceedings as for contempt on the failure of the delinquent to comply with the order of the court in chancery.

The case of Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226, affirms the right of a wife under a judicial decree of separation from bed and board, who has been awarded alimony by the courts of the state of New York, payable in instalments, to maintain a suit in equity in a court of the United States in the state of Wisconsin by her next friend to enforce the payment of such alimony. It was said in the course of the opinion: "Courts of equity will interfere to compel the payment of alimony which has been decreed to a wife by the ecclesiastical court in England. Such a jurisdiction is ancient there, and the principal reason for its exercise is equally applicable to the courts of equity in the United States. It is that, when a court of competent jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties decrees a divorce, and alimony to the wife as its incident, and is unable of itself to enforce the decree summarily upon the husband, that courts of equity will interfere to prevent the decree from being defeated by fraud. The interference, however, is limited to cases in which alimony has been decreed; then only to the extent of what is due, and always to cases in which no appeal is pending from the decree for the divorce or for alimony. . . . The parties to a cause for a divorce and for alimony are as much bound by a decree for both, which has been given by one of our state courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and over the parties, as the same parties would be if the decree had been given in the ecclesiastical court of England. The decree in both is a judgment of record, and will be received as such by other courts. And such a judgment or decree, rendered in any state of the United States, the court having jurisdiction, will be carried into judgment in any other state, to have there the same binding force that it has in the state in which it was originally given. For such a purpose, both the equity courts of the United States and the same courts of the states have jurisdiction." This case was cited as an authority in Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761, and in Wagner v. Wagner (Wagener v. Latham) 26 R. I. 27, 65 L.R.A. 816, 57 Atl. 1058, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 578, and, if the holding be limited to a case in which a final award of alimony has been made in a sister state, with no power reserved in the court, in the decree itself or inherent in the court under the law, either the common law or the statute law, to modify or amend the decree as to the amount, its authority should be said to remain unshaken. It will be noticed that, as to the award of alimony to the wife in this case, the decree contains no reservation of authority to subsequently modify the decree. The statute of Oklahoma was introduced in evidence by the defendant, and the only provision which bears upon the power of the court in such cases is as follows: "When a divorce is granted, the court shall make provision for guardianship, custody, support, and education of the minor children of the marriage, and may modify or change any order in this respect whenever circumstances render such change proper." [2 Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, § 4838.] It will be seen that this limits the statutory authority to modify the decree to the subject of the allowance for the support and education of the minor children. It is contended in the brief of the defendant's counsel that this right exists in a court of equity independent of statute. We do not agree with this contention. On the contrary, we think the authorities generally sustain the proposition that a decree for alimony in a case of divorce a vinculo, made without reserve, although payable in instalments, is final, and cannot be changed after enrolment of the decree. See Sampson v. Sampson, 16 R. I. 456, 3 L.R.A. 349, 16 Atl. 711; Livingston v. Livingston, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L.R.A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600, 66 N. E. 123; Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 220; Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456. In most of the states the power to amend the decree as to alimony is reserved to the court by statute; but, in the absence of such reservation or authority, or of a reservation in the decree itself, we think the determination should be treated as final. We think the decree for the arrears due the wife is within the authority of the court, and should be affirmed. But different considerations control as to that portion of the decree which found in favor of the complainant for the arrears in payments for the support of the minor children.

A well-considered case, which has become a leading case upon this question, is that of Lynde v. Lynde, reported in 41 App. Div. 280, 53 N. Y. Supp. 507, in 162 N. Y. 405, 48 L.R.A. 679, 76 Am. St. Rep. 332, 56 N. E. 979, and in 181 U. S. 183, 45 L. ed. 810, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555. In that case an action was brought in the supreme court of New York to recover upon the final decree of the circuit court in chancery of the state of New Jersey, which New Jersey court had adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant $7,800 and a counsel fee of $1,000, and that the defendant should pay to her permanent alimony at the rate of $80 per week from the date of the decree, and to give security for the payment of the several sums directed, etc. On the hearing of this case, the appellate division held that, in so far as the decree of New Jersey adjudged the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff in a certain sum at the date of its rendition, it was a final adjudication, and entitled as such to recognition in the court of a sister state, established a debt against the defendant, and had extraterritorial value and force. It also found that, so far as the decree made provision for the payment of alimony in the future, it remained subject to the discretion of the chancellor and lacked conclusiveness of character, and recovery was therefore limited to the amount found due at the date of the decree. From this decision both parties appealed to the court of appeals, where, upon a very full discussion of the subject, and a full review of the case of Barber v. Barber, the court affirmed the judgment. From this decree both parties again appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Gray, and contains the following: "The decree for the payment of $8,840 was for a fixed sum already due, and the judgment of the court below was properly restricted to that. The provision of the payment for alimony in the future was subject to the discretion of the court of chancery of New Jersey, which might, at any time, alter it, and was not a final judgment for a fixed sum." The conclusion reached in Lynde v. Lynde has been followed in Page v. Page, 189 Mass. 85, 75 N. E. 92, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 296, in Israel v. Israel, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168, 79 C. C. A. 32, 148 Fed. 576, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 697, and in Sistare v. Sistare, 80 Conn. 1, 66 Atl. 772, while the authority of the case is questioned in Wagner v. Wagner, supra. In speaking of the latter case, the supreme court of Utah in Hunt v. Monroe, 32 Utah, 428, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 91 Pac. 260, says: 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"This is the only case decided after the Lynde Case . . . which holds to the doctrine that a judgment like the one at bar may be sued on in a sister state before the state court . . . has fixed an absolute sum due and payable at some time prior to the bringing of the action thereon." So far as our examination has extended, we have also failed to find any other case in which the doctrine of the Lynde Case has been either misapprehended or repudiated.

It follows from what we have said that the decree, in so far as it contains an award for the arrears in payments accruing to the defendant for the care and custody of the minor children, should be reversed, without prejudice to the right of the complainant to apply for relief to the court in Oklahoma. See also Nixon v. Wright, 146 Mich. 231, 109 N. W. 274, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 547.

The remaining question is whether the remedy by proceedings as for contempt is open in this case. In the absence of a statute authorizing attachment for nonpayment of permanent alimony, it has been held in this state that such remedy is not open. See North v. North, 39 Mich. 67. We have a statute, however, which provides (act No. 230, p. 360, Pub. Acts 1899) that "every court of record shall have power to punish by fine or imprisonment, or either, any neglect or violation of duty . . . in the following cases: . . . The disobedience or refusal to comply with any order of such court for the payment of alimony, either permanent or temporary, made in any suit for divorce." It is to be noticed that the authority conferred by this statute is limited to suits for divorce. The present suit is not a suit for divorce. It is a suit brought for the purpose of obtaining a money decree based upon a judgment of another state, and does not call upon the court to consider the question of divorce at all. As was said in Page v. Page, supra: "In this commonwealth the authority to grant alimony is now derived wholly from the statutes. . . . Upon this petition, therefore, we cannot make any inquiry as to the proper amount to be allowed as alimony, nor can the order of the Maine court as to alimony be enforced in any of the ways set forth in our statutes. . . . We can have no part in the matter until the question of amount has been there settled, and even then we cannot make use of the statute proceedings because they are not applicable."

The order adjudging the defendant guilty of contempt will be set aside. The decree below is modified as indicated by this opinion, and the defendant will recover costs of this appeal, to be applied upon the decree awarded complainant.

This note is supplemental to that appended to the case of Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139, where the earlier cases upon the subject are collected.

Where pledgee does not appear as owner.

One whose relation to a national bank is that of a pledgee of its stock, and who is not registered as owner, but as holding it as collateral, and who has not held himself out as such, is not chargeable with personal liability for debts of the bank imposed by law upon shareholders. *Beal v. He can become chargeable with such liability, only by becoming the owner of the shares in fact, or by holding himself out to be the owner, and thereby estopping himself to deny his personal liability as such. *Rankin v. Same — evidence.

2. The findings of fact herein, to the effect that the shares of stock here in question were issued by the corporation to the respondent as collateral security for the payment of a debt due to it by the corporation, and the fact that the stock was so issued and held was duly entered in the stock record of the corporation, are sustained by the evidence. The trial court did not err in denying appellant's motion to amend such findings.

(November 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff and the receiver of defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County allowing respondent's claim upon a complaint in intervention as a creditor of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

A national bank which receives as collateral security for a note the stock of another national bank, and, on default, proceeds to sell the stock and bid it in, is not liable as a stockholder, where it never has a transfer of the shares made on the books, and, as between the pledgee bank and the debtor, who claims that the sale is invalid, the stock continues to be held merely as collateral for his debt. Robinson v. Southern Nat. Bank, 180 U. S. 295, 45 L. ed. 530, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, affirming 36 C. C. A. 584, 94 Fed. 964. The court said that, where one national bank takes the shares of another national bank as security for a loan, there is a presumption against any intention to become the owner of the collateral.

And, where there is no pretense of a change of ownership, one who has taken national-bank stock as collateral is liable as a shareholder only upon the ground of estoppel. Fratr v. Old Nat. Bank, 42 C. C. A. 133, 101 Fed. 391, affirming 86 Fed. 1008; Welles v. Larrabee, 2 L.R.A. 471, 36 Fed. 866.

And only in a clear case can a pledgee of national-bank stock be held liable on this ground. Fratr v. Old Nat. Bank, supra.

Where pledges appears as owner.

One who takes a certificate of stock from its owner as collateral security for a loan, and thereafter causes a new certificate to be issued to him in his own name, will be liable for the unpaid portion of the subscription price of the original shares either to the corporation (People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rauer, 2 Cal. App. 445, 84 Pac. 329), or to corporate creditors (Fouche v.

respondent as a stockholder and the issuing of any stock to it.

The findings of fact of the trial court, so far as they relate to the appellant's claim, as receiver, to recover the amount of the alleged stock liability, are substantially as follows: On July 15, 1904, the defendant was indebted to the respondent intervener in the sum of $5,000, which was evidenced by a promissory note executed for that amount by the defendant to the respondent, no part of which has ever been paid, except the sum of $1,028.50. On the same day the defendant issued and delivered to the respondent its certificate for 50 shares of its stock as collateral security for the payment of such note. Upon the issuance of the stock, an entry was made in the stock book or certificate stub book of the defendant company, by the person duly authorized to make such entries, in words and figures as follows: "Issued for Collateral Security for note of even date for PE, JJJ, JJ. W. E. J. Certificate No. 58 for 50 Shares Issued to Loeb & Schoenfeld, Co. 451 Broadway. Dated July 15, 1904. From whom transferred: . . ." The words above italicized were entered in writing, and the balance of the entry constituted the printed portion of the stub. No other entry of the issuance of the stock was at any time made upon any of the books of the defendant company. A large amount of the indebtedness of the defendant which is still unpaid was incurred after July 15, 1904. As a conclusion of law the court directed judgment ly, the latter will be held an innocent purchaser; and, when the certificate does not contain notice of a lien thereon for the balance of the unpaid value, upon a sale by the corporation therefor, the pledgee is entitled to receive two thirds of the purchase price and the corporation one third. Ingles Land Co. v. Knoxville F. Ins. Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 53 S. W. 1111.

Where the corporate officers have knowledge that stock is held in pledge, the corporation cannot enforce a lien thereon for an indebtedness due it from the original holder under a by-law, of which the pledgee is ignorant, providing that no transfer, unless made on the books of the corporation, shall be binding upon it; and that no transfer shall be made when the registered holder is indebted to it. Des Moines Loan & T. Co. v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 97 Iowa, 668, 66 N. W. 914.

Dummy holder.

The pledgee of national-bank stock, who is not registered as the owner, may have such stock listed in the name of an irresponsible employee without becoming liable to creditors as a shareholder, even though this is done for the purpose of escaping such liability. Rankin v. Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. supra; Hulitt v. Ohio Valley Nat. Bank, 69 C. C. A. 609, 137 Fed. 461; Wilson v. Merchants' Loan & T. Co. 39 C. C. A. 231, 98 Fed. 688, affirmed in 183 U. S. 121, 46 L. ed. 113, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 55; National Park Bank v. Harmon, 25 C. C. A. 214, 51 U. S. App. 148, 79 Fed. 891, affirmed in 172 U. S. 644, 43 L. ed. 1182, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877.

Where one to whom national-bank shares have been pledged, under a power of attorney indorsed thereon, caused them to be transferred on the books of the bank to a third person as trustee for the pledgeor and the pledgee, the latter is not liable for an assessment levied by the Comptroller upon the stockholders. Hayes v. Federal Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. 105 Fed. 160.

And the formal assent of the pledgeor is unnecessary where the certificates are indorsed in blank. Higgins v. Fidelity Ins. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Trust & S. D. Co. 46 C. C. A. 509, 108 Fed. 475, affirmed in 189 U. S. 242, 47 L. ed. 792, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

And, where the question whether shares of national-bank stock registered in the name of another than the pledgee are held by him as owner or as pledgee turns upon the proper conclusion to be drawn from a commercial correspondence, in connection with other facts and circumstances, it is properly referred to a jury, although the construction of written instruments is ordinarily a question for the court. Rankin v. Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. 189 U. S. 242, 47 L. ed. 792, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

So, whether such pledgee is estopped to deny his personal liability as a shareholder by speaking of himself as holding or owning the stock, in letters to the officers of the bank, who understood perfectly the capacity in which such stock is retained, is a question for the jury. Ibid. See also Williams v. American Nat. Bank, infra.

Payment of debt or retransfer.

The pledgee of national-bank stock pledged by the owner as collateral security for a loan, with power of a public or private sale for the liquidation of the pledge, becomes the beneficiary owner of such stock, and, as such, subject to liability of a stockholder upon an assessment by the Comptroller of the Currency, where, after the death of the pledgeor, the pledgee causes the stock to be registered in the name of an employee with no beneficial interest, and afterwards indorses upon the note the supposed value of the stock as of the date of credit, and presents the note, as reduced by the amount of such valuation, to the pledgeor's administrator, who allows the claim in this form. Ohio Valley Nat. Bank v. Hulitt, 204 U. S. 162, 51 L. ed. 423, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 179.

A transfer of bank stock on the corporate books to a pledgee does not render him liable as a stockholder for corporate indebtedness created after the stock had been retransferred on the books to the pledgeor on payment of the loan, notwithstanding the pledgee's failure to give notice of the re-allowing the respondent's claim in full. The appellant moved the court to amend its findings to the effect that the certificate for the 50 shares of stock was absolute on its face, and ever since the issue of such shares they have stood of record on the books of the defendant in the name of the respondent, whereby it became and now is the legal holder of such shares. The motion was denied, and judgment entered allowing the respondent's claim, but not that of the receiver. He appealed from the judgment.

1. The first question raised by appellant's assignment of errors is that the trial court erred in denying its motion to amend its findings of fact as requested. If the stock was issued to the respondent by the defendant simply as collateral security for the payment of its promissory note to the respondent, and such fact appeared upon the face of the stock record of the defendant, it is immaterial in this case what the terms of the certificate were. Again, the certificate was not in evidence, and there was no evidence which would require a finding that the certificate did not conform to the entry in the defendant's stock record. Nor was the court required to find that the respondent was the owner and record holder of the legal title of the shares of stock. The court found all the evidentiary facts relevant to the question whether respondent was such owner of record, or whether such record showed that the respondent was holding the stock as collateral security for the payment of its note. The necessary transfer as required by the corporate charter to exempt him from the existing individual liability as a stockholder, which is limited to the par value of his stock at the time any indebtedness is created. Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 192 U. S. 386, 43 L. ed. 491, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 314, affirming 112 Fed. 812.

One to whom a certificate of stock is issued directly as collateral security for a loan made to the subscriber therefor is liable for a statutory liability as a shareholder, even though the stock had been retransferred to the subscriber by the pledgee before the bank became insolvent, under a statute rendering stockholders so liable for one year after any sale or transfer of their stock. State v. Bank of New England, 70 Minn. 398, 68 Am. St. Rep. 538, 73 N. W. 153.

Taking stock as pledge from corporation.

One receiving unpaid stock as collateral security for a loan of money to the corporation which issued it does not render the holder liable to the corporate creditors unless they be misled thereby, where, by statute, the issue of unpaid stock is forbidden and declared to be void. Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139, 22 C. C. A. 110, 46 U. S. App. 281, 76 Fed. 166, rehearing denied in 36 L.R.A. 153, 23 C. C. A. 454, 46 U. S. App. 619, 77 Fed. 774.

Neither is one to whom such stock is transferred for the pledgee's benefit liable thereon, unless he has permitted himself to be held out as a shareholder, and credit has been extended the corporation in reliance thereon. Sturtevant v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 32 C. C. A. 57, 60 U. S. App. 235, 88 Fed. 613.

So, where one loans money to a corporation, and takes a certificate of stock as collateral security in his own name without qualification, and the stock pledgeor, after his name, states, "Note five years. Stock as collateral, due 1907,"—he is not liable as a stockholder, where, by statute, it is provided that "a pledgee for value, holding a certificate of stock of a corporation for security merely, shall not, while he holds such 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

stock, be subject to any of the liabilities of a stockholder unless he appears on the books of the corporation as the absolute owner of such stock." Re Noyes Bros. 136 Fed. 977.

And the above decision was followed in Ex parte Clark, 136 Fed. 981, where the entry upon the stock book was: "Jan. 23, 1902, three year note, due Jan. 23, 1905,"—together with the name of the holder, the number of shares, and the certificate number.

And, upon the insolvency of a corporation, one cannot be held liable to creditors as a shareholder where he holds stock which the corporation had issued to him as collateral security for a loan to it, where the claims of creditors accrued before he so acquired the stock. Gilman v. Gross, 97 Wis. 224, 72 N. W. 885.

So, one holding a certificate of stock may show by parol that he holds it merely as collateral security for a loan made to the corporation itself. Williams v. American Nat. Bank, 29 C. C. A. 203, 56 U. S. App. 316, 85 Fed. 376.

Upon a rehearing of the last case (42 C. C. A. 101, 101 Fed. 943), it was held that the pledgee was not estopped from showing that she was not a stockholder by reason of having received from the receiver of the bank a list of shareholders among which her name appeared without denying that fact, and that she did not bring an action to recover the loan until two years thereafter.

Neither is the pledgee estopped from showing such fact by reason of entries upon the corporate books showing her to be a stockholder, though she did not receipt for the certificate of stock, and it did not appear that she knew of such entries ever having been made. Ibid.

Nor does an estoppel arise by the fact that in letters written to the Comptroller of the Currency the pledgee, who was an inexperienced woman in business matters, referred to herself as a shareholder, where the bank officers testify that she received the stock merely as collateral security for the loan, as, under all the circumstances, the question of estoppel was for the jury.

the defendant for $100. The plaintiff made a motion on various grounds to set aside the verdict as to both defendants, and for a new trial. The motion was denied as to the Holmes & Hallowell Company, and granted as to Spear, unless he consented that the verdict against him should be increased to $350. This he did, and the motion was therefore denied. Thereafter, on motion of the Holmes & Hallowell Company, the court ordered judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict. From the judgment entered on this order, the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The assignments of error are very numerous, but many of them need not be considered in view of the fact that we are satisfied that no cause of action was proven against the Holmes & Hallowell Company.

At the time of the accident, the Holmes & Hallowell Company was engaged in the fuel business in the city of Minneapolis. The defendant Spear was employed by it to deliver coal to the company's customers in the city. In making such deliveries, he used two teams, and was paid a stipulated sum per ton for coal delivered by his teams. The horses, harness, and bob sleds used in the work were owned and furnished by Spear, while the employer furnished the sled boxes, shovels, and chutes. Each team used by Spear consisted of two horses, with the accompanying outfit. Spear employed and paid a man named Davis to drive one of the teams. Davis worked for Spear, and not for the company. The teamsters did not collect for the coal delivered. Spear also owned a fifth horse, which he had for some time been renting to another employee of the company, named Osterman, and this party had been using it in delivering coal under an agreement similar to that existing between Spear and the company. For about four weeks prior to the accident Spear had not used this horse himself. On the morning of February 6, 1907, Osterman brought the horse to the company's yard for the purpose of returning it to Spear, and left it in one of the sheds, where it remained until near 3 o'clock in the afternoon. One of Spear's teams, with a load of coal ready for delivery, was standing in front of the coal-yard office, waiting until the proper ticket was made out for the driver. About 4 o'clock, Spear, being ready to start, took the extra horse and tied it to an iron brace on the rear of the sleigh with a rope which was fastened to the horse's halter. There was conflicting evidence as to the length of this rope, but it was evidently long enough to permit the horse to have entirely too much freedom. It may be conceded that the horse was thus hitched in a careless and negligent manner, and as a result he was able to swing about and injure a person on the sidewalk. Hansen, the superintendent and general foreman for the company, was in the office when Spear started with the led horse, and saw what occurred. While the team in this condition was passing along the streets of the city, something disturbed the led horse, and caused him to swing toward the sidewalk and kick a little girl who was standing there. Spear's liability for the damage thus resulting stands conceded, and the question is as to the liability of his employer for his negligent act.

Upon these facts, the Holmes & Hallowell Company was not liable for the damage which resulted from the negligence of Spear. Whatever principles and reasons may have controlled the decisions of other courts, the rule of liability of a master for the torts of his servant is now so thoroughly settled in this state as to render elaborate discussions no longer necessary. It is possible that there has at times been some confused thinking, and it may be that no single principle has uniformly been stated as the controlling reason for every decision. However this may be, there is no ambiguity in the rule framed and stated by the chief justice in the recent case of Barrett v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (Minn.) 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 416, 117 N. W. 1047. That rule is that "a master is responsible for the torts of his servant done in the course of his employment, with a view to the furtherance of his master's business, and not for a purpose personal to himself, whether the same be done negligently or wilfully, but within the scope of his agency, or in excess of his authority, or contrary to the express instructions of the master." Smith v. Munch, 65 Minn. 256, 68 N. W. 19; Larson v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. 71 Minn. 101, 73 N. W. 711; Lesch v. Great Northern R. Co. 93 Minn. 435, 101 N. W. 965; Crandall v. Boutell, 95 Minn. 114, 103 N. W. 800, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 122; Merrill v. Coats, 101 Minn. 43, 111 N. W. 836; Anderson v. International Harvester Co. 104 Minn. 49, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 440, 116 N. W. 101.

Applying the rule to the facts of the case at bar, we have but little difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the trial court properly ordered judgment to be entered in favor of the defendant company. Spear was employed by the company to deliver coal, and it was liable for his torts committed in the course of his employment with a view to the furtherance of his employer's business. But it was not liable for his torts when done for a purpose personal to himself. Spear was delivering coal for the company, but the leading of the extra horse had no connection with the performance of the duty which he owed to his employer. It was not connected in any manner with the duty of delivering the coal. The horse belonged to Spear. The company had no control over it. It had been rented, not by the company, but by Osterman. It had been used by Osterman, and not by the company. Osterman had returned it, not to the company, but to Spear. It was in the latter's possession, and under his control, and in leading it home he was serving his own purpose solely. It is true it was attached to the team which he was using in the company's business, but not in any auxiliary capacity. If the load had proven too heavy for the team to draw, and Spear had attempted in some way to use his extra horse to assist in drawing the load, we would have had a case of acting for the furtherance of the master's business. But nothing of the kind was done. Leading the horse was an act entirely disconnected with the work Spear was doing for the company, not done or assumed to have been done with a view to aid or further that business. Spear was handling his own property, for his own purpose, in his own way, and was alone responsible for the results of the negligent manner in which he acted. This being true, the fact that Hansen stood by and did not interfere with Spear's way of tying the horse is immaterial. The extra horse did not render the vehicle which was being used in the company's business unsafe and dangerous, and with Spear's own personal business Hansen had no concern. He was, therefore, under no obligation to superintend the hitching of the horse.

But it is urged that the company became liable for the negligence of Spear because it retained him in its employ after it had knowledge of this accident. The authorities do not sustain this contention. When there is no original liability for the act of a servant, because at the time of the negligence the servant was acting in his own personal business, the master does not become liable merely by reason of the fact that he thereafter retains the servant in his employ. The rule contended for by appellant would seem to render an employer liable for every act of negligence of which he had knowledge which had been committed by the employee prior to the time when he employed him. The fact that an employee is retained after knowledge of a negligent act for which the master is already liable is sometimes important as bearing upon the right to recover exemplary damages; and this is evidently all the Wisconsin court intended to hold in Cobb v. Simon, 119 Wis. 597, 100 Am. St. Rep. 909, 97 N. W. 276. This appears with reasonable clearness from the final disposition of the case on a subsequent appeal (124 Wis. 467, 102 N. W. 891), and from the cases cited (Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Wis. 654, 24 Am. Rep. 437; Robinson v. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ratification may supply the want of original authority to act as the servant of another. Thus, ratification of acts which another has, without authority, performed as his servant and for his benefit will render him liable for the latter's negligent acts which were so connected with the employment that he would have been liable for them as master if the latter had been his servant when committing them. A, while delivering coal which had been ordered by B from C, carelessly broke B's window, and it was found that A was not C's agent when he broke the window, but, as the delivery of the coal by him was ratified by C, it was held that such ratification made A the agent and servant of C during the delivery of the coal, and that C was therefore responsible for his negligence. Dempsey v. Chambers, 154 Mass. 330, 13 L.R.A. 219, 26 Am. St. Rep. 249, 28 N. E. 279. So, in Nims v. Mt. Hermon Boys' School, 160 Mass. 177, 22 L.R.A. 364, 39 Am. St. Rep. 467, 35 N. E. 776, it was held that an educational institution that ratified the actions of persons who had assumed to operate a ferry for it thereby became liable for personal injuries to a passenger caused by the negligence of the ferryman. Ratification may thus supply the want of authority in a person who, at the time of the negligent act, was assuming to represent a master; but the principle cannot apply to a case such as the one at bar. Spear was not assuming to act as the servant of the company when he adopted this method of taking care of his own horse. Merely retaining Spear in its employ could not in itself create liability for acts which had been done by him while engaged in his own personal business, and when not assuming to represent the company.

It is also contended that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested, that the plaintiff might recover against the company, if Spear, having a horse tied, as this one was, to the rear of the sleigh, drove the team too close to the curb, and, by reason thereof, the plaintiff was injured. This sounds plausible, but is essentially unsound. The team that was being used in the master's business was properly driven, and the burden of liability cannot be shifted to the master because the servant, for some purpose of his own, renders the outfit unsafe under certain circumstances. The negligent manner in which Spear tied the horse to the company's sleigh, and not the driving of the team, was the proximate cause of the injury. The instruction was properly refused.

The assignments directed to the rulings and instructions as to the right of the defendant's attorney to comment on the failure of the plaintiff's physician to testify that Spear had admitted that he was intoxicated, that an employers' liability company was the real defendant, the excluding of the insurance policy with statements therein tending to show that Spear was in the employ of the company, and the reception of certain evidence tending to show the relation of the parties, do not require consideration, as they relate to Spear's personal negligence, the extent of the injury, and other matters affecting only the amount of the recovery. They are no longer of importance after it has been decided that no liability whatever existed on the part of the company. The ultimate result, so far as liability is concerned, would have been the same had every such ruling been the other way.

Judgment affirmed.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the majority of the court, first, as to the correctness of the rule of law announced in the opinion; and, second, as to the applicability of that rule to the facts in this particular case.

1. The authorities cited sustain the rule that the master is responsible for the torts of his servant in the course of the employment, with a view to the furtherance of the master's business, and not for a purpose personal to himself. But the proposition that the master is not liable for the torts of his servant in the course of his employment, not done with a view to the furtherance of the master's business, but for a purpose personal to himself, does not follow from this any more than it does from the rule in Shelley's Case. "Bad law may be easily made by taking the converse of a legal proposition for law." Per Mr. Justice Gaynor in Novogrucky v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 125 App. Div. 715, 110 N. Y. Supp. 29. The authorities are wholly irrelevant, save only one, Larson v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. 71 Minn. 101, 73 N. W. 711. That case involved a malicious prosecution, which proceeded upon the assumption that the servant had instituted criminal proceedings to subserve a purpose personal to himself. It was therefore held that the master was not liable for this independent tort. It will subsequently be pointed out that this view of the law is not at all inconsistent with submitting the question of liability of the master in this case to the jury. The authorities cited with reference to ratification are not in point, and are, in my opinion, wholly alien to the controversy at bar. These artificial restrictions upon the master's liability which the majority opinion imposes, therefore, stand unsupported by the authorities cited. There are authorities which are not cited which do tend to support them, but they are opposed to the overwhelming weight of authority in general and in this state in particular. The subject is a wide one. Its proper consideration involves a review and discussion of such extent as to preclude adequate presentation within the narrow limits appropriate to a dissenting opinion. All that is feasible under the circumstances is a partial summary, which is the result of an actual and immediate examination in detail of practically all the relevant authorities on both sides of the controversy.

All authorities agree upon the obvious proposition that the master is not liable for the independent torts of his servant. The difficulty arises in determining what is and what is not an independent tort. In cases where the wrong complained of has absolutely no connection with the master's premises, instrumentalities, or facilities for doing business, the motive of a servant is a proper, and often a determining, consideration. This is particularly conspicuous in cases of false imprisonment and of malicious prosecution, as in Larson v. Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. supra. Even in these cases there is a manifest tendency to submit the question of the master's liability to the jury. 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 328; 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 19. In these cases no special duty is imposed upon the master to the person injured, for the violation of which by his servant he could properly be held responsible, by virtue of the relationship alone. If, of course, the master has in any way authorized or ratified the tort, his liability would arise, not from the fact of the relationship, but from consent, before or after the tort. Cases of this kind come fairly within the familiar principle that the master is liable for the tort of his servant acting within the scope of his authority, liberally defined. A larger liability has been recognized in all parts of this country in an increasingly large group of cases in which it is necessary, first, that the relationship of master and servant be established; and, second, that the servant's act in the course of his employment violate a duty owed by the master to the person injured. This class of cases covers an extremely wide range. It includes (1) cases in which a relation has been assumed by contract to which the common law has attached certain duties, as cases of common carriers, innkeepers, bailees for hire, proprietors of places of amusement who have charged admission, and others; (2) cases in which no duty was involved in connection with a contract, as in the group of cases in which a master has been held liable for the acts of his servants, done with a purpose personal to the servant, and whereby a customer, actual or prospective, has been injured; (3) cases in which the master has, by means of an instrumentality not dangerous, put the servant in a position to do harm; (4) cases in which a master has "intrusted to his servant the custody of an instrumentality capable of doing harm," as an engine, or a horse and wagon, or the like; and (5) many other instances. Cases number thousands; not absolute, but substantial, unanimity.

The conclusion reached by these very many cases has been stated thus: "If the wrongful act done by the servant is done in his representative capacity, and accords with the general scheme of his employment, the master should be held responsible for the injury done, whether the wrong was committed for the benefit of the master or for the servant's own personal advantage." Wm. R. Vance, in 4 Mich. L. Rev. 210. In his note to Mallach v. Ridley, 24 Abb. N. C. 172. Mr. Abbott says: "A few years ago it was almost universally held in this country that an act of the employee, the motive of which appeared to be his own malice, did not render the employer liable, even though done within the scope of the employment; but all the authorities which sanction that rule are now deemed in so far overruled, and, in respect to the question of the right of action, the motive of the servant is now immaterial; and even the fact that the employer gave proper instruction and that the act was in direct violation of those instructions does not shelter the employer." In Stranahan Bros. Catering Co. v. Coit, 55 Ohio St. 398, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 506, 45 N. E. 634, where the master was held liable for the malicious act of the servant, with intent to injure the master, in adulterating cream contrary to law, the rule was laid down that, "where a master owes to a third person the performance of some duty, as to do or not to do a particular act, and commits the performance of the duty to a servant, the master cannot escape responsibility if the servant fails to perform it, whether such failure be accidental or wilful, or whether it be the result of negligence or malice. Nor is the case altered if it appear that the malice was directed to the master." These statements may not be accurate in toto. None the less, they summarize the certain trend of decisions in this country on this point. It is true that in England the motive of the servant and the furtherance of the master's business are in general the determining factors, and that the earlier Massachusetts cases, taken as a whole, are in substantial, but not entire, accord. The tendency of the later Massachusetts cases is to bring the law of that state into harmony with the general American 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

rule. None of the cases which are apparently opposed, however, involved facts not distinguishable from those at bar. Indeed, as will presently be pointed out, under the English theory, the question in this case would, I think, have been for the jury.

The rule of law as it was established by this court before the decision of this case is the one generally in force in this country, and is well illustrated in McCord v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Minn. 181, 1 L.R.A. 143, 12 Am. St. Rep. 636, 39 N. W. 315. In that case defendant's local agent, who was also the agent of an express company, sent a forged despatch to plaintiff, a merchant in a neighboring city, requesting plaintiff to forward money to plaintiff's agent at defendant's agent's station. The money, in good faith forwarded by plaintiff, was intercepted by defendant's agent and converted to his own use. Vanderburgh, J., said: "The principal contention of defendant is, however, that the corporation is not liable for the fraudulent and tortious act of the agent in sending the message, and that the maxim Respondet superior does not apply in such a case, because the agent, in sending the despatch, was not acting for his master, but for himself, and about his own business, and was in fact the sender, and to be treated as having transcended his authority, and as acting outside of, and not in the course of, his employment, nor in furtherance of his master's business. But the rule which fastens a liability upon the master to third persons for the wrongful and unauthorized acts of his servant is not confined solely to that class of cases where the acts complained of are done in the course of the employment in furtherance of the master's business or interest, though there are many cases which fall within that rule. . . . Where the business with which the agent is intrusted involves a duty owed by the master to the public or third persons, if the agent, while so employed, by his own wrongful act occasions a violation of that duty, or an injury to the person interested in its faithful performance by or on behalf of the master, the master is liable for the breach of it, whether it be founded in contract or be a common-law duty growing out of the relations of the parties. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. §§ 149, 150, 154; Taylor, Corp. 2d ed. § 145. And it is immaterial in such case that the wrongful act of the servant is in itself wilful, malicious, or fraudulent."

2. At most, however, this was a case in which two motives were present, viz., the one to deliver coal for the master in pursuance of his business, and the other to take home the servant's horse for his own purpose. Under the rule announced, and under conception of the facts adopted by the majority, the master would have been liable so far as the first of these was concerned and would not have been liable under the second. This aspect has not been considered. The great weight of authority is to the effect that, where the servant, at the time of the commission of the tort, is engaged in executing his own private purpose, but at the same time is pursuing the master's business in the matter for which he was employed, the law will not undertake to fix with precision the line which separates the act of the servant from the act of the individual. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Cleveland, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1072, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 853, 100 S. W. 283, 286; Barmore v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 85 Miss. 443, 70 L.R.A. 627, 38 So. 210, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 594. Thus in Gracey v. Belfast Tramway Co. [1901] Ir. 2 Q. B. 324, Palles, C. B., said: "There is evidence that the servants, while riding the horses upon the road to the forge for their own amusement, ran a race upon the horses towards the forge, and in so doing rode negligently, and thereby caused the damage. Are the masters liable? If we eliminate what has been called 'the purpose of running a race,' admittedly they would be liable. In such a case the act of bringing the horses to the forge would undoubtedly have been one in the course of their employment. . . . But the ground of the masters' liability in such a case would not have been based on any such subtlety as that of a single purpose as distinguished from several purposes, but because the servants would have been doing their masters' business. . . . The act would have been done for the master. What, then, is the effect of the servants being actuated by the second purpose, that of riding a race? This second purpose was consistent with the first. . . . The basis of the case therefore is that a servant acting for two purposes, one of which is his master's and the other his own, renders the master responsible."

Here Spear was in the employ of the defendant company. He delivered coal for it. He was subject to the company's orders and in the company's pay. The master had the right and power to command and control him at the instant of his start and of the performance of the causal act. The very horse he was taking home was one used for the company's business. That title to the instrumentalities which he, or another servant, used on the company's behalf, was in himself, is not controlling, nor especially significant, so far as plaintiff is concerned. See Standard Oil Co. v. Parkinson, 82 C. C. A. 29, 152 Fed. 681; Patten v. Rea, 2 C. B. N. S. 606; Rahn v. Singer Mfg. Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 912, affirmed in 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175; Waters v. 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pioneer Fuel Co. 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52. As a matter of law, he had not abandoned his master's business for his own, nor had he departed from it. It was at least a question of fact whether or not his purpose was in furtherance of his master's enterprise and whether or not he was engaged in doing what his contract of service reasonably required. Mulvehill v. Bates, 31 Minn. 364, 47 Am. Rep. 796, 17 N. W. 959; Phelon v. Stiles, 43 Conn. 426; East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Reames, 173 Ill. 582, 51 N. E. 68. This was not a case where the servant was going on a frolic or errand of his own, without being at all on his master's business. Therefore the master was liable. Joel v. Morrison, 6 Car. & P. 501; Ritchie v. Waller, 27 L.R.A. 161, and note (63 Conn. 155, 43 Am. St. Rep. 361, 28 Atl. 29); Barmore v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 85 Miss. 426, 70 L.R.A. 627, 38 So. 210, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 594; Quinn v. Power, 87 N. Y. 535, 41 Am. Rep. 302. Moreover, defendant's superintendent, Hansen, whose instructions Spear was bound to obey, says he knew that the horse was tied to the wagon, as has been stated. He made no objection nor suggestion, and gave no instruction. The permission resembled command. Standard Steel Car Co. v. McGuire (C. C. A.) 161 Fed. 527. And see Fletcher v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 168 U. S. 135, 42 L. ed. 411, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 35. On this state of facts, in England, it would seem that the master would have been held responsible. In Patten v. Rea, supra, it was held that, if a servant is upon his master's business when he injures a third person by driving against him, the master is liable, although the horses belonged to the servant and the servant was at the same time attending to business of his own (to visit a doctor). There, as in the case at bar, "the master knew that he was going and in what manner he was going." This servant was not, as a matter of law, acting in a capacity different from that in which he was employed, and the servant was not, as a matter of law, so far an independent contractor as to exonerate the master. The present situation is substantially the same as if a conductor of a street car, to the knowledge of the foreman of the company, should put a long pole through the right-hand window of his car to take home with him for piscatorial or other purposes. If that pole struck a person using the highway, the company would certainly be responsible, although the pole would be the conductor's private property and was being conveyed for his purely personal purpose. The question whether this master was therefore liable is not to be determined, as a matter of law, in the master's favor.

ANDREW S. CHURCH, Plff. in Err.

(—N. J.—. 70 Atl. 138.)

Sale — corn — damage in transit.

Where a merchant directed another to have shipped to him corn of a certain kind and grade at a certain price over a certain railroad, the weight and grade of the corn to be evidenced by a certain official certificate, the fact that the corn, while in transit, became heated, will not excuse the vendee from payment of the purchase price.

(June 15, 1908.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in Essex County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the difference between the price realized upon the sale of corn which the defendant ordered from the plaintiff and refused to accept and the agreed price thereof. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Adrain, Silzer, & Pearce, for plaintiff in error:

Mere indorsement of a bill of lading, without delivery, will not pass title.

Headnote by MINTURN, J.

Case Note. — Loss of, or injury to, goods during shipment as affecting fulfillment of commission to purchase goods.

In the opinion in the case reported, it is pointed out that, in view of the fact that the written order so circumscribed the judgment of the one undertaking to furnish the goods that he was, in essence, a mere conduit or special agency through which the goods were to be delivered, the relation of the parties more nearly approached that of agent and principal than that of vendor and vendee. This note is therefore limited to a consideration of just what duties, with respect to the delivery of goods, arise out of such anomalous relation.

In Green v. Feil, 41 Wis. 620, it was held that one who ordered in his own name a turtle for a restaurant keeper was entitled to recover from him the amount paid therefor, even though he made such payment after he had notice from the restaurant keeper that the turtle, upon its arrival, was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Enc. Law, p. 206; Alderman v. Eastern R. Co. 115 Mass. 233.

Messrs. Brown & Beecher for defendant in error.

Minturn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant delivered to the plaintiff, a grain merchant in the city of Newark, the following order: "Please have shipped to me at South River, via N. J. Central Railroad, one car, three mixed corn, price 57. Shipment: Hurry. Terms: Arrival draft. Remarks: Western Official Certificate of weight and grade final." The plaintiff ordered the required corn from a concern at Toledo, Ohio, and it was delivered at South River, where the defendant refused to accept it upon the ground that it was damaged by heating. The plaintiff having waited a reasonable time for the defendant to accept the corn, finally sold it, after notice to defendant, and brought this action to recover the difference between the price realized upon the sale and the agreed price of the corn. The judgment of the Essex circuit court, where the case was tried without a jury, was for the plaintiff, and from that judgment this writ of error is taken.

The conspicuous feature of this case, which differentiates it from the ordinary case in the category of vendor and vendee, consists in the fact that the vendor in the case at bar was so limited and circumscribed in the exercise of judgment by the language of the written order, from which he derived his authority to purchase, that he was in essence a mere conduit or special agency, through which the goods were to be delivered. Upon the execution of the order, and substantial compliance with its requirements, his duty was performed, and in such a sick and dying condition that it could not be used, where the evidence tended to show that he was acting merely as agent, and it appeared that the turtle was purchased on his own credit, that it was healthy and strong and in good condition when shipped, and that it is the custom of the trade for buyers to take the risk of turtles shipped to them.

Although not in point upon the question under discussion, reference may be made to the case of Rice v. Montgomery, 4 Biss. 75, Fed. Cas. No. 11,753, in which it was held, in effect, that the law will presume the place of delivery of wheat to be purchased by a commission merchant for his principal to be the place where the commission merchant does business.

For a note upon passing of title to property by delivery thereof to a carrier for transportation to consignee or vendee, see Ramsey & G. Mfg. Co. v. Kelsea, 22 L.R.A. 415.

his right to the agreed compensation was complete. Butler v. Maples, 9 Wall. 766, 19 L. ed. 822; Story, Agency, 126. It will be observed that he was not to ship, but to "have shipped," to the defendant, at a fixed price, corn of a certain quality over a certain railroad; the grade or condition of the corn to be evidenced, not by his judgment, but by a certain form of certificate which, as between him and the defendant, was to be final. "Both in morals and in law," remarks a recent writer of distinction, "one is responsible for the thing which he brings to pass, whether he employs an inanimate object to effectuate his purpose, or sets in operation the infinitely more complicated chain of causation which results from the employment of another moral agent." 2 Street, Legal Liability, chap. 41, p. 429.

The trial court found as a fact that the corn when shipped was in good condition, and therefore the delivery to the carrier in accordance with the specific instructions contained in this order relieved the shipper of liability for damage in transitu, and imposed the burden and risk of damage upon the consignee. Dawes v. Peck, 8 T. R. 330; Conn v. Reed, 73 N. J. L. 112, 62 Atl. 271; Wilcox Silver Plate Co. v. Green, 72 N. Y. 17; Silvestri v. Missocchi, 165 Mass. 337, 43 N. E. 114; Benjamin, Sales, § 693; Tiffany, Sales, 195. In the light of this status, it became a matter of slight, if any, importance whether the testimony of a conceded dealer in grain, not for the purpose of contradicting the terms of the order, but for the purpose of eliciting the meaning of a trade expression employed therein, was relevant, although, under the undeviating rule and policy of the courts in such matters, it was properly admitted. Steward v. Scudder, 24 N. J. L. 96; New Jersey Zinc Co. v. Boston Franklinite Co. 15 N. J. Eq. 418; 17 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 685.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

DANIEL W. VALENTINE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF ENGLEWOOD et al.

(— N. J. —, 71 Atl. 344.)

Municipal corporation — board of health — liability.

1. A municipal corporation is not liable for the acts of a board of health created by public statute for the public benefit, even though its members are appointed by the municipal authorities.

Headnotes by SWAYZE, J.

Health — quarantine — personal liability.

2. The members of a board of health, acting in performance of a public duty, under a public statute, to prevent the spread of an infectious or contagious disease, are not personally liable in a civil action for damages arising out of their acts in establishing a quarantine, even where the disease does not actually exist, provided they act in good faith.

Constitutional rights — infringement — board of health.

3. Section 15 of the board of health act (Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1638), which forbids suits against the board, its officers or agents, unless upon proof that the board acted without reasonable and probable cause to believe that the alleged cause of disease was in fact prejudicial and hazardous to the public health, does not infringe the constitutional provisions protecting private property and individual liberty.

Health — actions against board.

4. Section 15 of the board of health act (Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1638) in effect gives an action against the board upon proof of the facts therein set forth; but in such suits the question of reasonable and probable cause is for the court.

(November 16, 1908.)

ERROR to the Bergen County Circuit of the Supreme Court to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the unjustifiable quarantining of plaintiff's premises. Affirmed.

Statement by Swayze, J.:

The declaration contains counts in trespass quare clausum fregit, for false imprisonment, and for libel. The defendants plead in justification that there were 30 cases of scarlet fever in the city of Englewood, and that the board of health had reasonable and probable cause to believe that the plaintiff's daughter was ill of the disease, and thereupon caused the plaintiff to be notified that they had declared his house quarantined, and that he had the option to place his child and her attendant in strict quarantine in a separate room, and to have the contents of the house fumigated by the board of health, or to have the entire house and occupants quarantined. The replication denied that the board of health had reasonable and probable cause to believe that the plaintiff's daughter was suffering from scarlet fever, and tendered issue thereon.

Note. — As to personal liability of member of board of health or of health officer, see case note to Rohn v. Osmun, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 635.

At the trial, upon the plaintiff's opening that the board of health acted without any authority at all of the city, a nonsuit was ordered in favor of the city of Englewood. The case proceeded against the board of health and the individual defendants.

The evidence showed that the city physician, one of the defendants, reported to the board of health a case of scarlet fever at the plaintiff's residence; and that at a consultation between Dr. Currie, of Englewood, and Dr. Bulkley, of New York city, the two latter stated that the case was not scarlet fever; that four local physicians were of opinion, from a statement of symptoms and without seeing the patient, that the case was scarlet fever. The city physician informed the plaintiff, at first by verbal notice, that the house was to be quarantined, and apparently gave the plaintiff the option to have a strict quarantine of the whole house established, or a quarantine of his daughter and her attendant in one room of the house. The plaintiff, in order to secure proof as to who was responsible, demanded a written notice; and thereupon such a notice was served, signed by the secretary of the board of health, in which the option of having the child and her attendant quarantined in a separate room, or of having the entire house and occupants quarantined, was again given to the plaintiff. He declined to avail himself of the option, a card was placed upon his office door indicating that there was scarlet fever on the premises, and measures were taken by the board of health to fumigate the house. There seems to have been nothing further done by way of enforcing the quarantine. When the plaintiff was asked what kept him in quarantine, what was done, and who did it, his only answer was that the health inspector came and fumigated the house.

The board of health had adopted ordinances, pursuant to the statute, providing that persons affected by certain diseases, of which scarlet fever was one, should be isolated, quarantined, or removed to such a locality as the board might order and direct; and that buildings and property which might become infected should be disinfected or destroyed; and that the board might establish such separation and isolation or domestic quarantine of the sick from persons not necessary as attendants as should be needed in order to prevent the spread of the disease.

Hutton v. Camden and Sumner v. Philadelphia, supra.

Messrs. Albert O. Wall and Charles W. Hulst for defendants in error.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We find it convenient to deal first with the liability of the city of Englewood.

The precise question involved is new in this court. In Kehoe v. Rutherford, 74 N. J. L. 659, 122 Am. St. Rep. 411, 65 Atl. 1048, there was active wrongdoing by the municipal authorities in collecting surface water and discharging it so that it injured the plaintiff's land, but that act was the act of the corporation itself for a special corporate purpose. A distinction is made in the cases in other jurisdictions between such acts and acts done in performance of a governmental function in execution of powers of a public and general character, delegated to the municipality for the welfare and protection of its inhabitants or the general public. Of the numerous cases collected in 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1257, it will suffice to refer to Daly v. New Haven, 69 Conn. 644, 38 Atl. 397; Colwell v. Waterbury, 74 Conn. 568, 57 L.R.A. 218, 51 Atl. 530; Hourigan v. Norwich, 77 Conn. 358, 59 Atl. 487; Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 196; Manners v. Haverhill, 135 Mass. 165; Clark v. Easton, 146 Mass. 43, 14 N. E. 795; Maximilian v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160, 20 Am. Rep. 468. These cases have been followed by our supreme court in Tomlin v. Hildreth, 65 N. J. L. 438, 47 Atl. 649. A more recent case is Cunningham v. Seattle, 42 Wash. 134, 84 Pac. 641, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 629, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 805, in a note to which numerous cases as to the nonliability of a municipality for acts of its firemen are collected.

The principle has been frequently applied to the acts of boards of health. Summers v. Daviess County, 103 Ind. 262, 53 Am. Rep. 512, 2 N. E. 725; Mitchell v. Rockland, 52 Me. 118; Nicholson v. Detroit, 129 Mich. 246, 56 L.R.A. 601, 88 N. W. 695; Bryant v. St. Paul, 33 Minn. 289, 53 Am. Rep. 31, 23 N. W. 220; Lowe v. Conroy, 120 Wis. 151, 66 L.R.A. 907, 102 Am. St. Rep. 983, 97 N. W. 942, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 341. It seems to be founded in reason.

The acts complained of by the plaintiff were in performance of a governmental function imposed upon the board of health by the legislature, under a special statute relating to boards of health, for the benefit of the public at large. The duty was quite independent of any provisions of the city charter, and was in no way for the benefit of the city in its corporate capacity, or as the owner of property. The only connection, under the statute, between the city and the board of health, is that the members of the board of health are appointed by the governing body of the city. This however, did not make them the servants or agents of the city; they were public officers, notwithstanding the method of their appointment. Hafford v. New Bedford and Fisher v. Boston, supra; Murphy v. Needham, 176 Mass. 422, 57 N. E. 689; Maximilian v. New York, supra; Felch v. Weare, 69 N. H. 617, 45 Atl. 591.

The city could only be held by applying the rule respondet superior, and that rule has no application in a case where the persons who commit the act complained of are neither the servants nor agents of the municipal corporation, nor acting in the performance of any corporate duty. So far as their act is outside the limits of the corporate duty of the municipality, it cannot be considered the act of the municipality. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. §§ 968-974. The case is not altered by the fact that the court excluded the question whether the records of the common council showed any action on their part in regard to the quarantining of the plaintiff. At that time the nonsuit had already been ordered, and nothing was said to indicate that the offer was to show anything that would conflict with the statement of plaintiff's counsel in his opening that the board of health acted without any authority from the city. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider whether the liability of the city would have been different if express authority had been shown. The evidence, moreover, becomes quite immaterial in view of other considerations to be stated.

No liability of the city was shown, and in that respect the nonsuit was right.

The statute creating the board of health authorizes it to adopt ordinances to prevent the spreading of dangerous epidemics or contagious diseases, and to maintain and enforce sufficient quarantine when it deems necessary. Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1644, § 49. The board is required by § 13 to examine into all causes of disease injurious to the health of the inhabitants, and to cause the same to be removed and abated. Section 15 enacts that no suit shall be maintained in any of the courts of this state to recover damages against any such board, its officers or agents, on proceedings had by them to abate and remove a cause of disease, unless it shall be shown in such suit that the cause of disease did not exist, was not hazardous and prejudicial to the public health, and that the board acted without reasonable and probable cause to believe that such cause was in fact prejudicial and hazardous to the public health.

The evidence in the present case justified an inference on the part of the jury that scarlet fever did not in fact exist; and, as the trial judge nonsuited the plaintiff, his ruling cannot be vindicated, if the actual existence of the disease is essential to the justification of the defendants. The issue joined upon the pleadings was only whether there existed reasonable and probable cause to believe that the defendant's daughter was sick with scarlet fever; but it would be taking too narrow a view of the case to decide it upon this question of pleading only. We prefer to rest the decision upon broader grounds.

In the case of American Print Works v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. L. 248, and, on appeal, 21 N. J. L. 714, 47 Am. Dec. 190, and 23 N. J. L. 590, 57 Am. Dec. 420, it was held in the supreme court, in a very able opinion by Chief Justice Green, that the defendant, who, as mayor of New York city, had destroyed real and personal property in order to stop the spread of a great fire, was not to be held responsible, since he acted in pursuance of a duty imposed upon him by statute, and not for private emolument or for his individual benefit. Chief Justice Green said: "It is a well-settled principle that, where a person in discharge of a public duty, not acting for private emolument, unwittingly injures another in the performance of the act, while acting with due skill and caution, he is not answerable for damages." The judgment was reversed in this court, upon the ground that the statutes of New York provided no compensation for the personal property destroyed, that the facts amounted to a taking of property for public use without compensation, and the case was therefore within the prohibition of our state Constitution. The case afterwards came before the supreme court on a demurrer to amended pleas, and the judgment there rendered in favor of the defendant was affirmed in this court. 23 N. J. L. 590, 57 Am. Dec. 420. Justice Carpenter, in the course of his opinion, took occasion to say, at page 600 of 23 N. J. L.: "A public officer, acting in good faith, upon a sudden and alarming emergency, under the sanction of a constitutional and valid law in a matter of public duty, is not to be held responsible for the unavoidable and necessary result of such act of duty. An injured party may have a right to resort to the public for satisfaction; but the law has ever held that the officer himself, not exceeding his power and not guilty of oppression or bad faith, is not personally liable." He quotes with approval what was said by Justice Nevius in Sinnickson v. Johnson, 17 N. J. L. 150, 34 Am. Dec. 184, where a distinction was drawn between acts done exclusively for the public interest by agents appointed by public authority, acting within the scope of that authority, and acts done for a private and individual interest. Justice Carpenter limits the exemption of public officers to acts done under the sanction of a constitutional and valid law, but, at the same time, quotes Chancellor Kent as extending the exemption to acts done under statutes which were prima facie good,—a view which seems to be sustained by the opinion expressed by this court in Lang v. Bayonne, 74 N. J. L. 455, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 93, 122 Am. St. Rep. 391, 68 Atl. 90. It is however, unnecessary for us to go to that extent in the present case, since we think the act constitutional for reasons to be hereafter stated. Nor is it necessary for us to go to the full extent justified by Justice Carpenter's language. He does not limit the exemption to officers acting judicial-ly, and exercising their best judgment upon a state of facts, the conclusion from which may be doubtful or difficult.

In the discussion which arose after the decision of the famous case of Ashby v. White, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 455, it was expressly stated in the argument prepared by the committee of the House of Lords, which was principally drawn up by the Lord Chief Justice, that fraud and malice were the gist of the action. The language quoted on page 484 is: "There is no danger to an honest officer that means to do his duty; for where there is a real doubt touching the party's right of voting, and the officer makes use of the best means to be informed, and it is plain his mistake arose from the difficulty of the case, and not from any malicious or partial design, no jury will find an officer guilty in such case, nor can any court direct them to do it, for it is the fraud and the malice that entitles the party to the action." In that case fraud and malice were averred in the declaration. Some American courts have gone so far as to hold that the officer is exempt even in a case of corruption and malice. Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U. S. 483, 493, et seq., 40 L. ed. 780, 784, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631, which was an action against the Postmaster General; Weaver v. Devendorf, 3 Denio, 117, which was an action against an assessor for loss caused by an illegal assessment. Where there is no fraud or malice, the overwhelming weight of authority is in favor of the exemption of the public officer from civil action; and the cases are not limited to officers acting in a judicial capacity, but reach the case of all who are called upon in behalf of the public to exercise their judgment. Thus, it was held in Otis v. Watkins, 9 Cranch, 339, 3 L. ed. 752, that a collector of a port detaining a vessel under the embargo law of 1808 (act Cong. April 25, 1808, chap. 66, 2 Stat. at L. 499) need not show that his opinion that the vessel was about to violate the law was correct, nor that he used reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining the facts upon which his opinion was formed. It was said to be enough that he honestly entertained the opinion upon which he acted; and, although Chief Justice Marshall dissented, he did not question this general principle, but placed his dissent upon entirely different grounds. The same view was expressed in Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 87, 11 L. ed. 506. In New York, it was held, in Williams v. Weaver, 75 N. Y. 30, that assessors were not liable in a civil action for an unlawful levy. The court said: "That class of public officials is charged with duties which require the exercise of judicial functions, and, when they are called upon thus to act, they are protected from the consequences which may flow from any error they may commit. Surrounded as these officers are by great difficulties in the discharge of their official duties, the law shields them when acting within their jurisdiction. In order to establish an individual liability, it must be made to appear against the assessors, not only that the assessment was erroneous, but that such assessors had no jurisdiction whatever in laying the tax." The case subsequently went to the Supreme Court of the United States (100 U. S. 547, 25 L. ed. 708), and Justice Miller said, in speaking of the decision of the court of appeals of New York upon this point: "Whether that court decided that question correctly or not, it is not a Federal question, but one of general municipal law, to be governed either by the common law or the statute law of the state. In either case it presents no question on which this court is authorized to review the judgment of a state court." This case was decided in 1880, long after the discussion arising out of the 14th Amendment had become familiar; and it is, therefore, not only authority for the exemption of public officers, but for the proposition that such exemption does not contravene the 14th Amendment.

The principle was held applicable in Teall v. Felton, 1 N. Y. 537, 49 Am. Dec. 352, to the case of a postmaster who assumed to charge letter postage on a newspaper; but it was held in that particular case that the postmaster did not act in a judicial capacity. The rule has been applied in the case of health officers. Whidden v. Cheever, 69 N. H. 142, 76 Am. St. Rep. 154, 44 Atl. 908.

The exemption of officers from liability extends only to matters in which they have jurisdiction under the statutes; and it may be said that the board of health has no jurisdiction unless a cause of disease actually exists. This view is too narrow. The principle which was adopted by this court, and vindicated in an able opinion of Chief Justice Beasley in Grove v. Van Duyn, 44 N. J. L. 654, 42 Am. Rep. 648, note, is applicable. It is enough if the matter is colorably, though not really, within their jurisdiction.

A different view has been expressed in Massachusetts v. Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L.R.A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100, which was followed in Pearson v. Zehr, 138 Ill. 48, 32 Am. St. Rep. 113, 29 N. E. 854, and in Lowe v. Conroy, 120 Wis. 151, 66 L.R.A. 907, 102 Am. St. Rep. 983, 97 N. W. 942, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 341. The reasons are well stated by Mr. Justice Holmes, but are combated with equal force by Justice Devens, and the case is weakened as an authority by the fact that it was decided 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cided by a bare majority of the court. Upon principle, we cannot distinguish the case from those above cited, where administrative officers were held exempt when called upon to act judicially. If a postmaster general, or a postmaster, or a collector of a port, or an assessor of taxes is to be immune when his error in judgment causes the loss of another's liberty or property, we think a board of health is entitled to a like immunity. A justice of the peace is immune if he acts in a matter colorably within his jurisdiction. The underlying reason is not the judicial character of the officer, but the judicial character of the act, and the public necessity that public agents engaged in the performance of a public duty, in obedience to the command of a statute, should not suffer personally for an error of judgment which the wisest and most circumspect cannot avoid. It is not quite accurate to say that in such cases a man is deprived of liberty or property without compensation. As Justice Devens pointed out, "the individual is presumed to be compensated by the benefit which such regulations confer upon the community of which he is a member, or by which his property is protected." The case may, however, be looked at in another light. The board of health is acting for the public in the exercise of the police power of the state. For an error in the exercise of that power, no doubt the state ought to answer. Just as in an action for malicious prosecution, the principal who instigates the prosecution may be held although the justice and the constable are immune, so in a case of an error in judgment by the board of health it is the state which ought to answer for the default of its agent, acting in obedience to its statutory command. The state does not, it is true, answer in an ordinary action at law in this or any other case, but there is the same remedy in all cases,—an appeal to the justice of the state. A different view from that of the Massachusetts court prevailed in Raymond v. Fish, 51 Conn. 80, 50 Am. Rep. 3, and in Beeks v. Dickinson County, 131 Iowa, 244, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 831, 108 N. W. 311, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 812, a case decided after the cases last cited.

Miller v. Horton was decided in the absence of a statute such as ours, forbidding an action against the board unless lack of reasonable and probable cause can be shown. The same distinguished court has vindicated the right of the legislature to require all imported rags to be put through a disinfecting process at the expense of the owner, whether actually infected or not (Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113, 11 N. E. 929), upon the ground that the legislature had the power to pronounce imported rags, not yet disinfected, nuisances in themselves, or, as Justice Holmes said in the later case, because the danger was too great to permit discrimination. What our legislature has done in the health act is, in substance, to say that anything which may possibly be a cause of disease is subject to the regulations of the board of health, when that board has reasonable and probable cause to think it to be in fact a cause of disease. Under such a statute, the cases above cited from Massachusetts, Illinois, and Wisconsin are not in point, and there is no reason why the ordinary rule exempting public officers from private action should not be applied. The board of health was acting for the benefit of the public at large, and pursuant to a duty imposed upon it by a public statute. There is not only no proof of malice, but the board acted with care, and not hastily, for it decided only after a conference between its own physician, a reputable physician of Englewood called in by the plaintiff, and a specialist from the city of New York. The doctors disagreed, at least in a measure; and the board of health was called upon to decide. They may have decided erroneously, but the matter was colorably within their jurisdiction.

The only difficulty which arises is that caused by the first opinion of this court in American Print Works v. Lawrence. We there held that the mayor and aldermen of New York could not be exempted from civil liability where their act resulted in what this court held to be a taking of private property for public use, contrary to our Constitution. In view of the subsequent opinion of the court in that case, and the eminence of the judges of the supreme court, whose opinion was reversed in the first case, we think that although we are bound by the actual decision of this court reported in 21 N. J. L. 248, we ought not to extend it further than the exact point decided requires. It was limited to a case where private property was taken for public use; and it was held that destruction to prevent the spread of a conflagration was such a taking. In the present case there was no taking of private property for public use. The acts of the defendant amounted to a mere trespass. It is urged, however, that the same principle ought to be applied because of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which prohibits a state from depriving a citizen of liberty without due process of law. To this we think there are two answers: In fact, the plaintiff was not deprived of his liberty; and the conduct of the defendants constituted due process of law, as that term is used in cases of this character. He was not deprived of his liberty, because the option was given to him to quarantine his daughter in a room of the house, if he so chose. He elected the alternative of having the whole house quarantined, but that was his voluntary choice; and there seems to have been no show of force to prevent his going and coming as he chose. Whatever may be argued as to the imprisonment of his daughter, that is not now in question. His personal liberty does not seem to have been restrained. We were careful to say in Hebrew v. Pulis, 73 N. J. L. 621, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580, 118 Am. St. Rep. 716, 64 Atl. 121, that, although constraint might be caused by threats, as well as by actual force, the words or conduct must be such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, and the means of coercion must be at hand. The latter element is lacking in the present case. The real injury of which the plaintiff complains is the destruction of his business by posting upon his office door a notice that there was scarlet fever in the house. This, if false, was a libel, but it was not a deprivation of liberty.

Again, in cases affecting the public health, due process of law does not always require notice and a hearing. People ex rel. Copcutt v. Board of Health, 140 N. Y. 1, 23 L.R.A. 481, 37 Am. St. Rep. 522, 35 N. E. 320. Where the board of health is required to act upon an emergency, due process of law requires only that they should be liable to an action in case they act wrongfully; but the action to which they are liable is only such action as the law gives. In this case the common law, as we have already shown, gave no right of action if the matter upon which the board decided was colorably within its jurisdiction. The object of the 14th Amendment was not to give parties remedies which did not exist at the common law, but to protect them against hostile action by the state depriving them of the existing remedies. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588.

There is nothing in Hutton v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 122, 23 Am. Rep. 203, inconsistent with our view. The alleged nuisance in that case consisted in the fact that the defendants' lot lay below the grade of the street, so that water collected there, and the order of the board of health was to fill the lot to grade. Obviously, this presented no such emergency as required immediate action. There was opportunity for notice and a hearing. That case was a suit by the city to recover the cost of filling the lot to grade; and a distinction is to be made between the adjudication of the board of health as a defense to civil liability on their part, and as the basis of an action against the party alleged to maintain a nuisance.

If the action had been by Hutton against the board or health, or their employees, for trespass in filling the lot up to grade, the case would have been similar to the present. This distinction is carefully pointed out by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Sallem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 431, at page 449, 96 Am. Dec. 650, where the court said: "When there appears to have been no notice to the parties to be affected, and no opportunity afforded them to be heard in defense of their rights, whatever operation the adjudication may have upon the res, and however conclusive it may be held for the protection of those who act, or derive rights, under it, the adjudication itself can have no valid operation against parties who may be named in the proceedings. If it proceeds to declare any obligation, or impose any liability, upon such parties, they may, in any subsequent suit to enforce it, deny the validity of the judgment, and controvert the facts upon which it was based."

Hutton v. Camden was a case where it was attempted to make the adjudication of the board of health that a nuisance existed final and conclusive, not only for the protection of the board against an action of trespass, but as basis of a legal liability of the landowner. In the present case the legislature has itself undertaken in effect to make a nuisance of what the board of health shall, upon reasonable and probable cause, determine to be a cause of disease. It is unnecessary to cite the numerous cases decided by the United States Supreme Court justifying such a legislative exercise of the police power. In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, a statute declaring all places in which intoxicating liquors are manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away to be common nuisances was sustained, although the effect was to destroy the value of property. In Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, the eight-hour law of Utah was sustained, although it interfered with the freedom of contract. In Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 49 L. ed. 643, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 765, the compulsory vaccination act of Massachusetts was sustained, although it interfered with a man's personal liberty. These cases are but illustrations of the extent to which the highest tribunal has gone in vindication of the principle that the individual must yield somewhat of his personal rights to society in return for the benefits of society which he enjoys. We think it not unreasonable to require him, in a case like the present, to depend for redress upon the sense of justice of the public, rather than upon a right of action against public officers who have acted as they thought for the public weal in a matter of public duty.

The common-law rights of the plaintiff are protected by the Constitution, but the legislature has, by the health act, given the plaintiff a right of action against the board as such where he can show that the cause of disease did not exist, that it was not hazardous and prejudicial to the public health, and that the board acted without reasonable and probable cause to believe that it was in fact prejudicial and hazardous to the public health. Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 1638, § 15. Although the language of the section is in form that no suit shall be maintained against the board of health unless these facts are established, the necessary implication is that, if the facts are established, a suit may be maintained.

In giving this action, the legislature had the right to determine what facts should be necessary to sustain it. They imposed no novel or unreasonable condition. The provision requiring that the plaintiff should show that the board of health acted without reasonable or probable cause is in line with the existing common law in cases of this character. By common law an officer was justified, in certain cases, in making an arrest, where he had reasonable and probable cause for belief in the guilt of the person detained; and, in actions for libel, a communication, fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, is privileged, in the absence of proof of malice. The principle underlying these cases is applicable to the present case. By the act of March 24, 1903 (P. L. p. 96), it is made a crime for any person, having reason to believe that he is affected with scarlet fever, to appear in any public place, and for any person knowingly to subject another, without the latter's knowledge, to exposure to the infection of any such disease. We do not mean to say that this statute reaches the present case; but it can hardly be libelous for the board of health, in good faith, to give notice of the existence of scarlet fever, when it is a crime for one who has reason to believe that he is affected with the disease to appear in public; and it must be within the power of the legislature to give the right of restraint, amounting to imprisonment, to public officers who have reasonable and probable cause to believe that the crime denounced by the act of 1903 has been, or is likely to be, committed. It is, at any rate, enough for the present purpose that, in providing for this action, the legislature has made the want of reasonable and probable cause essential to the maintenance of the action.

The question remains whether a case is made out under this statute against any of the defendants. As to the board of health, it is clear that they acted upon the advice of their own physician, supported by the report made to them of the opinion of four other local physicians. We think that they were not bound to accept the opinion of the physician called by the plaintiff, and the specialist called from New York, but were justified in relying upon the advice of their own officer.

The case as to the physician himself is somewhat different. Prior to establishing the quarantine he had, at the conference with the other physicians, expressed himself as satisfied with their diagnosis, and it may be that this evidence would be sufficient to carry the case to a jury as to Dr. Bradner, if the question were properly a jury question. At the time this statute was adopted, the words "reasonable and probable cause" were a familiar expression in the law, arising most frequently in actions for malicious prosecution; and, however anomalous the rule may be, it was well established that the question of existence of reasonable and probable cause, in an action for malicious prosecution, was a question for the court, where, as in this case, the facts are undisputed. McFadden v. Lane, 71 N. J. L. 624, 60 Atl. 365, citing with approval Bell v. Atlantic City R. Co. 58 N. J. L. 227, 33 Atl. 211; Magowan v. Rickey, 64 N. J. L. 402, 45 Atl. 804. In our judgment the case failed to establish a want of reasonable and probable cause as against Dr. Bradner. The evidence of what Bulkley said to him, or what Currie said as to the antecedent family history of the patient, would not change this result, and its exclusion was not injurious error. Dr. Bradner seems to have been a reputable physician, acting according to his best light, in a case which four of his fellow physicians, to whom the symptoms were described, pronounced to be scarlet fever. Whether it was so or not, he had reasonable and probable cause to think it so.

In an action for false imprisonment, where the arrest is justified on the ground of reasonable and probable cause, the question is for the court, where the facts are not disputed. Lister v. Perryman, L. R. 4 H. L. 521, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 177.

Middleton, the inspector, seems to have acted only in carrying out the order of the board whose servant he was, and comes within the words of the statute exempting officers or agents of the board from suit.

For the reasons stated, we think the trial judge was right in directing a nonsuit, and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RUSHMORE

v.

MANHATTAN SCREW & STAMPING WORKS, Appt.

(— C. C. A. —, 163 Fed. 939.)

Trademark — ordinary words.

1. The one first putting a flaring front on a lamp shell of his design is not entitled to a monopoly on the words "flare front" in connection with lamps, in the absence of anything to show that the words have acquired a secondary meaning.

Unfair trade — copying designs.

2. The maker of an automobile search light inclosed in a shell of graceful but unpatented design may maintain a suit for injunction, damages, and profits against another who sells similar lights inclosed in similar shells, although they are prominently marked with the maker's name, and have never been represented to be those of complainant, where, notwithstanding these facts, intending purchasers may mistakenly purchase defendant's lamps for those of complainant.

(Noyes, Circuit Judge, dissents.)

Case Note. — Right to protection against use by rival of similar design, shell, or pattern not protected by patent.

Aside from the cases cited in RUSHMORE v. MANHATTAN SCREW & STAMPING WORKS, but few cases are to be found upon the question suggested in the above title, except such as are gathered in a note to Bender v. Enterprise Mfg. Co. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 448, wherein was considered the right to manufacture the identical article of another not protected by patent. The two questions are to a great extent analogous, and depend upon the same general principle that unfair competition is not established by proof of similarity in form, dimensions, or general appearance alone,—especially where it appears to result from an effort to comply with the physical requirements essential to commercial success, and not from a design to misrepresent the origin of the article. The doctrine enunciated and applied in the cases considered in that note, to the effect that the doctrine of unfair competition cannot be successfully invoked to abridge the freedom of trade competition, where the similarity complained of is with reference to necessary functional characteristics of the article in question equally applies to the question here under consideration. The cases reviewed in that note will not be considered herein. Neither will the question be considered as to the right of one manufacturer to simulate the dress or package of similar goods of an-

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York granting a preliminary injunction enjoining the use of a lamp of certain design. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Coxe, Circuit Judge:

On appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction enjoining the defendant, its officers, employees, and agents, "not to manufacture, sell or use, exhibit or advertise, any automobile lamp or lamps having inclosing cases or shells made in imitation of, or resembling, or a colorable variation of, the Rushmore 'Flare Front' search-light lamp, exhibited to this court herein, and of which a sample has been offered, marked 'exhibit A,' except in so far as such lamps may be the genuine lamps made by complainant, and not to use, in connection with any lamp made in imitation of, or resembling, or a colorable variation of, said exhibit A Rushmore lamp, the words, 'flare front,' and not to print or publish, or have printed or published, in catalogues or advertisements or elsewhere, any cut or representation of any lamp in imitation of, or similar to, said exhibit A Rushmore lamp, and not to print or publish, in any catalogue or advertisement or elsewhere, the words 'flare front' or similar words in connection with the representation of any lamp made in imitation of or similar to said exhibit A lamp, except in so far as such representation and such words may be used to advertise, or in connection with, genuine Rushmore lamps made by complainant."

Argued before Coxe and Noyes, Circuit Judges, and Adams, District Judge.

Mr. Arthur v. Briesen, with Mr. Hans v. Briesen, for appellant.

Mr. Alfred Wilkinson for appellee.

Coxe, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1905, the complainant adopted a design for the shell of an automobile lamp, and in the following January exhibited it at the exhibition of automobiles at Madison Square Garden, New York. This is the complainant's lamp in controversy. Its exterior is pleasing to the eye, and it is unquestionably a high-grade lamp, but there is nothing strikingly novel or ornamental about it. In general contour it resembles the search light which has for years been in use upon excursion boats and vessels of war, the principal difference being in the addition, by the complainant, of the so-called "flare front;" the glass front of the lamp being larger in other. Cases wherein that question was considered will be found in a note to George G. Fox Co. v. Glynn, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1096.

The ground upon which the decision of the court in RUSHMORE v. MANHATTAN SCREW & STAMPING WORKS is based is not entirely clear in the opinion itself, as it is not entirely clear whether the shell of the lamp simulated or imitated was a necessary and functional part of the lamp itself, so that such a shell was necessary to the commercial success of the lamp as an automobile lamp. It is therefore uncertain just how far the court, in holding the defendant guilty of unfair competition in imitating the shell of complainant's lamp, intended to carry that doctrine, although it said that, in reaching its conclusion, the doctrine of unfair competition was thereby being extended to its utmost limit.

The cases of Enterprise Mfg. Co. v. Landers, 65 C. C. A. 587, 131 Fed. 240, and Yale & T. Mfg. Co. v. Alder, 83 C. C. A. 149, 154 Fed. 37, which the court treated as decisive of the question, were, according to the opinions therein, clearly cases of unnecessary simulation of nonfunctional parts of the articles involved; and the doctrine enunciated in those cases is in harmony with the doctrine heretofore stated. In addition to the cases included in the note in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 448, the doctrine therein enunciated also finds support in other cases which were not strictly within the scope of that note, because the article, while imitating the article of another, was not identical therewith.

Thus, in Marvel Co. v. Pearl, 66 C. C. A. 226, 133 Fed. 160, it was held that proof of similarity in form, dimensions, or general appearance, alone, would not establish unfair competition if such similarity was characteristic of the article in question, or resulted from an effort to comply with the physical requirements essential to its successful operation, rather than for the purpose of deceiving the public as to the origin of the article.

This doctrine was also applied to sectional bookcases in Globe-Wernicke Co. v. Fred Macey Co. 56 C. C. A. 304, 119 Fed. 696, wherein it was said that to admit the claim of the appellant would create a monopoly of such proportions that it would practically engross the business of manufacturing sectional bookcases; that the public have the right to make bookcases of any size; and, from the nature of the requirements, they must have resemblance in form, dimensions, and appearance; so no one can have the exclusive privilege of locating them in sections, one above another, or end to end, nor of making them of any kind of wood or metal that he chooses, nor of the style or finish of his work, unless it is peculiar and out of the ordinary. Continuing, the court says: "Upon the claim made for the appellant, it would be impossible, without invading complainant's right, to construct and sell a bookcase having the diameter than the body of the lamp except as it flares out near the front to meet and inclose the glass. No patent has been granted to Rushmore either for a combination, for a new article of manufacture, or for a design for the shell of the lamp. It is possible that, had application been made, a design patent might have been granted and sustained. In West Disinfecting Co. v. Frank, 79 C. C. A. 359, 149 Fed. 423, this court recently held valid a design patent for a somewhat similar structure.

The defendant is manufacturing a lamp which, though differing in several details of construction, unquestionably resembles in external appearance the Rushmore lamp. If a valid design patent had been issued to the complainant we have no doubt that the defendant's lamp would infringe, and, believing as we do that the points of difference are unimportant, we will consider the question involved upon the theory that the shells of the two lamps are substantially identical.

The defendant has adopted "Phoebus" as its trademark, and its lamp is known to the trade as the Phoebus lamp. All of its lamps have conspicuously displayed on the top thereof a name plate with a black background inscribed "Phoebus, the lamp of Quality, Model 601, Manhattan Screw & Stamping Works, N. Y." The officers of most desirable characteristics. Nor is it competent for one person to appropriate to his own purposes any common and general characteristics of the goods he manufactures to such an extent that another shall be impeded or embarrassed in his free right to use such characteristics in his own business."

The same conclusion was reached in Diamond Match Co. v. Saginaw Match Co. 74 C. C. A. 59, 142 Fed. 727, as to matches having a tip of the same color, the court saying that the characteristic of the tip was specific, and not general, and properly applied to all tip matches. There was no claim in this case, however, that there was any simulation of the packages in which the matches were inclosed and sold; in fact, the contrary was shown to be the case.

Where, however, there is an obvious attempt at unnecessary simulation, such simulation will be restrained on the ground that it is unfair competition. Thus, in George Frost Co. v. E. B. Estes & Sons, 156 Fed. 677, a manufacturer of a rubber button, to be used as a part of a hose supporter, was protected against simulation of the rubber button by a rival who manufactured a wooden button to be used in the same connection, and who colored it to imitate rubber, and made the whole button in imitation of complainant's.

To the same effect is H. Mueller Mfg. Co. v. A. Y. McDonaly & M. Mfg. Co. 104 Fed. 1001, as to the right of a rival to simulate the form, shape, and size of waste the defendant deny that they, or anyone connected with the defendant, have ever in any way represented their lamps as those of the complainant. There are allegations in the bill, made upon information and belief, that the defendant has palmed off its lamps upon innocent purchasers as the Rushmore lamps, but there is nothing in the affidavits worthy of the name of evidence to establish these allegations. The affidavits, in our judgment, also fail to establish an exclusive right to the use of the name "Flare Front." The complainant says in his affidavit, "I am aware that what might be called 'flaring fronts' have been used on other forms of lamps entirely different in appearance from my exhibit A lamp, for instance, the old carriage lamps; but I am positive that I am the first who has ever used these flare fronts on any lamp similar in appearance to my exhibit A." Assuming the correctness of this statement, we do not think the fact that complainant was the first to put a flaring front on a shell of his design entitles him to a monopoly of these words. We regard them as descriptive merely and are of the opinion that an injunction should not issue, at least until proof more cogent than anything which now appears in the record is presented showing that they have acquired a secondary meaning. So far, then, as the prayer stops and waste cocks and similar plumbers' supplies. In this case it was recognized that defendant had a right to use the essential form or shape and size of a cap and handle for its goods. But it was held that the exact size, form, outward appearance, or dress of the cap and handle were not essential features of the device. That the outward form in dress or appearance was purely arbitrary and fanciful; and its simulation by another would, therefore, amount to unfair competition.

A case which seems to go to the extreme in applying the doctrine of protection on the ground of unfair competition is Edison Mfg. Co. v. Gladstone (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 391. In this case certain copper and zinc plates not protected by patent were so formed as to fit in a frame forming part of a battery to generate electricity, the battery in question was called the Edison battery, and the company manufacturing it also made copper and zinc plates of a shape, size, and form to fit in a frame which was a part of the battery. A rival manufacturer of plates of the same shape and size, and made to be used in these batteries, as well as other batteries, was restrained from following the same shape, size, and form, unless distinguishing marks were used which would prevent the public from being misled. It does not, however, clearly appear whether the change required by the court, in order to prevent deception of the public, was so radical that the defendant's plates would not fit complainant's batteries.

for an injunction is based upon the use of the name "Flare Front" and the allegation that the defendant has actually deceived purchasers by representing that its lamps were made by the complainant, the most that can be said is that the questions are involved in doubt. This court has uniformly held that an injunction should not issue in a doubtful case. Hall Signal Co. v. General R. Signal Co. 82 C. C. A. 653, 153 Fed. 907; Cleveland Foundry Co. v. Silver, 68 C. C. A. 87, 134 Fed. 591; Hildreth v. Norton (Feb. 11, 1908) 86 C. C. A. 408, 159 Fed. 428.

As we read the opinion of the judge of the circuit court, he finds no actual fraud and no evidence that the defendant is now using the words "flare front." He says: "Assuming that at the present time the defendant is not using the words 'flare front,' is not selling its product as Rushmore lamps, and is not using in any way either of these words or phrases, the question is whether plaintiff is entitled to be protected from unnecessary imitation of nonfunctional parts of his well-known lamp. It seems to me that, under the cases of Enterprise Mfg. Co. v. Landers, 65 C. C. A. 587, 131 Fed. 240, and Marvel Co. v. Pearl, 66 C. C. A. 226, 133 Fed. 160, he is so entitled." We are thus confronted with the naked question of law: Can one who manufactures and sells a well-known article of commerce, like an automobile search light inclosed in a shell of graceful but unpatented design, maintain a bill for an injunction, profits, and damages against a defendant who sells automobile search lights inclosed in a similar shell, with his name prominently appearing thereon as the maker, and who has never represented that his lamps were made by the complainant? We feel constrained to answer this question in the affirmative upon the authority of Enterprise Mfg. Co. v. Landers, supra, and Yale & T. Mfg. Co. v. Alder, 83 C. C. A. 149, 154 Fed. 37. Both of these cases were decided by this court, and we see no way to distinguish them, on principle, from the case at bar. We are of the opinion, however, that to answer this question in favor of the complainant carries the doctrine of unfair competition to its utmost limit. If it be pushed much farther those engaged in trade will be encouraged to run to the courts with trivial complaints over the petty details of business, and thus will grow up a judicial paternalism which in time may become intolerable.

This cause, or one involving the question at issue, may be easily brought here on appeal from final decree, and heard at the next term. After the witnesses have been cross-examined, we may be able to tell with 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

much greater certainty whether the competition of which the complainant complains is produced by the similarity of the shells of the two devices, or by the fact that defendant is selling its lamps at a much lower price. It appears from the record that purchasers of automobiles belong to the wealthy class, who are not particular about the price paid so long as they secure durable and efficient machines. They are not the class of buyers who might purchase a padlock, for instance, after a casual inspection; and it is not easy to understand how such fastidious buyers with the Phœbus name plate before them can be deceived into thinking that they are purchasing the Rushmore lamp. If it should appear, after full hearing, that the effect of the injunction will be to stifle legitimate competition rather than to punish unfair competition, we will not hesitate to dissolve it; but, upon the affidavits now before us, the majority of the court is of the opinion that the case is controlled by the former decisions of this court.

The order should be modified by excluding from its provisions the prohibition against the use of the name "Flare Front," and, as so modified, is affirmed.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. The complainant manufactures an automobile lamp of a particular shape, bearing his name, and known as the "Rushmore lamp." The defendant manufactures a lamp of a similar shape, with its name conspicuously displayed upon it, which is known as the "Phœbus lamp." The complainant has no design patent, and his case must stand, if at all, as a case of unfair trading, in which the essential element is deception,—the palming off of one's goods as those of another. But how a purchaser could be deceived into buying an automobile lamp plainly marked with the name and trademark of the defendant, in the belief that it was the complainant's lamp, is more than I can comprehend. The mere similarity in the shape of the lamps, in my opinion, is not sufficient to produce such a result. The majority, however, in view of earlier decisions of the court, are of the opinion that the similarity in itself establishes a case of unfair competition. But, whatever view may be taken of those decisions, I think the complainant, upon the proof as it stands, has failed to bring himself within them. Certainly they do not hold that, when the shape of an unpatented article possesses advantages from the viewpoint of mechanical utility, it is unfair or unlawful to imitate it. Possibly upon full hearing the complainant may be able to show unnecessary imitation of nonfunctional parts, but I am not satisfied from the affidavits that he has yet done so.

In my opinion the order granting the preliminary injunction should be reversed.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA, Resp't.,
v.

MOSES MINOR, Appt.

(— N. D. —, 117 N. W. 528.)

Malicious mischief — malice.

1. The word "maliciously," as used in § 9315, Rev. Codes 1905, relating to the crime of "malicious mischief," is to be given a restricted meaning, and imports that the act to which it relates must have resulted from actual ill-will or revenge. It implies an intent to vex and annoy the owner of the property injured.

Same — necessity of.

2. Malice is an essential ingredient of the crime of malicious mischief, and a conviction cannot be sustained in the absence of any evidence disclosing such malice.

Same — evidence.

3. Evidence examined, and held not sufficient to warrant the conviction of appellant.

Case Note. — Definition of "malice" as a requisite of the offense of malicious mischief.

Many of the cases involving the criminal offense known as "malicious mischief" turn upon this point, viz., whether the "malice" necessary to the crime must be directed against the owner of the property injured, or whether malice against the property itself is sufficient. In general it may be said that such authorities do not attempt any definition of "malice" as used in the statutes covering malicious mischief, and they have been excluded from this note with one or two exceptions.

A study of the cases has suggested the desirability of attempting some classification, and those decisions holding in harmony with STATE v. MINOR, that actual malice is necessary to constitute the offense, have been grouped together. A majority of the cases seem to consider constructive malice sufficient, and in a few instances the decisions do not draw satisfactory distinctions.

The wilful doing of an unlawful act, which is ordinarily sufficient to establish criminal malice, is not sufficient under statutes defining "malicious mischief." To constitute this offense, an injury must not only be wilful, but it must, in addition, be malicious in the sense that it was done out of a spirit of cruelty, hostility, or revenge. Com. v. Wil-

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Williams County convicting him of malicious mischief. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Engerud, Holt, & Frame, with Messrs. Palda & Burke, for appellant:

To bring the act within the purview of the law against malicious mischief, it must appear that the mischief is done intentionally.

State v. Flynn, 28 Iowa, 26; Sattler v. People, 59 Ill. 68; State v. Newkirk, 49 Mo. 84; State v. Hause, 71 N. C. 518; Goforth v. State, 8 Humph. 37; Palmer v. State, 45 Ind. 388; R. v. Langford, Car. & M. 602; Barlow v. State, 120 Ind. 56, 22 N. E. 88.

Messrs. T. F. McCue, Attorney General, R. N. Stevens, and Van R. Brown, for respondent:

The accepted legal meaning of "malice," when used in a criminal statute, is: "An unlawful act intentionally done, without just cause or excuse."

State v. Grassle, 74 Mo. App. 313.

"Malicious" imports nothing more than a wicked or perverse disposition with which a party committed the act.

Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373.

"Malicious mischief" is defined to be any malicious or mischievous physical injury to the rights of another.

State v. Foote, 71 Conn. 737, 43 Atl. 488.

liams, 110 Mass. 401, and to the same effect, see State v. Tarlton (S. D.) 118 N. W. 706.

To bring an act within the meaning of "malice," as used to define malicious mischief, it must be done unlawfully, and "wilfully or purposely" to injure another. State v. Graeme, 130 Mo. App. 138, 108 S. W. 1131.

In Folwell v. State, 49 N. J. L. 31, 6 Atl. 619, it was held that, to support an indictment for "wilfully and maliciously" doing an act in violation of the statute, there must have existed an evil mind; and that without this the act could not be malicious.

To find a defendant guilty of malicious mischief, the jury must be satisfied that the offense was committed in a spirit of wanton cruelty or wicked revenge. Com. v. Walden, 3 Cush. 558.

"Malice" as defined in Johnson v. State, 61 Ala. 9, means, with ill-will, malevolence, grudge, spite, wicked intention, enmity.

The malice necessary to constitute the offense of malicious mischief is something more than the malice which is ordinarily inferred from the wilful doing of an unlawful act without excuse. The statutes punishing such offense are devised to reach that class of cases where the act is done with a deliberate intention to injure. State v. Johnson, 7 Wyo. 615, 54 Pac. 502.

State v. Robinson, 20 N. C. 120 (3 Dev. & B. L. 130), 32 Am. Dec. 661, holds that 54 Pac. 502; Rose v. State, 19 Tex. App. 470; State v. Flynn, 28 Iowa, 26; Barlow v. State, 120 Ind. 56, 22 N. E. 88.

Applying the above rule of construction to the evidence in this case, we are required to hold that the state wholly failed to establish the charge contained in the information, and we therefore conclude that the judgment appealed from must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

All concur.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

J. S. McLEOD et al., Respts.,

v.

NANCY E. DESPAIN, Impleaded, etc., et al., Appts., (49 Or. 536, 90 Pac. 492.)

Contract — trustee — notice.

1. The word "trustee," added to the payee's name in a written instrument, is sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to all the terms and conditions under which it may have been executed, and, in the absence of such inquiry, knowledge thereof will be presumed.

Trust — collection by trustee — effect on beneficiary.

2. Persons furnishing money to purchase a mortgage, which, together with the note which it secures, is assigned to the cashier of a bank as trustee, new notes for the amounts furnished by the respective parties being executed to him and indorsed to them with his guaranty, under the agreement that the trustee shall collect the rents and receive all sums paid on principal, executing releases of the mortgaged property as payments are made, are bound by his act of receiving money; and, in case he becomes insolvent without paying it over, cannot compel a second payment by the mortgagor.

Mortgage — application of payment — duty of mortgagor.

3. The mortgagor, in making payments to the trustee, need not see that they are properly applied, where several persons furnish money to purchase a mortgage, which, together with the note which it secures, is assigned to a trustee, who is to collect rents and receive payments on the principal and apply them in satisfaction of the debt, the share of each contributor being shown by a new note executed to the trustee and indorsed with a guaranty to the contributor.

Note. — As to use of word "trustee" as affecting negotiability, or as notice of rights of parties to negotiable paper, see case note to Ford v. First Nat. Bank, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 188. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

On Petition for Rehearing.

Principal — acts of agent — repudiation.

4. Buyers of a mortgage, who have left it and the notes secured by it in the hands of a trustee to receive the rents on the mortgaged property and payments on the indebtedness, cannot take advantage of his acts so far as they are advantageous to them and repudiate collections made by him which he failed to turn over prior to his insolvency.

Contract — absence of writing — performance.

5. Absence of writing will not defeat, under the statute of frauds, an agreement between mortgagor, the purchaser of the mortgage, and a trustee, to hold it and collect the rents and payments of principal and make application thereof, after the agreement has been performed.

Party — defendant — affirmative relief — estoppel.

6. That the holder of one of the new notes representing the respective interests of the purchasers of a mortgage does not originate a suit to foreclose the mortgage to secure its payment, but is made defendant therein, does not prevent the application against him of the rule that he cannot treat the original note as existing for the purpose of upholding the mortgage and repudiate it for other purposes, where he seeks affirmative relief in his answer, by way of foreclosure of the mortgage, to secure the sum due on his note.

Evidence — entries against interest.

7. Entries in a trustee's account showing payments on indebtedness due the beneficiaries are admissions against interest, which are proper evidence to show that the payments were made, in a controversy between the mortgagor and the beneficiaries of the trust.

Trust — collections by trustee.

8. That one constituted trustee to hold a mortgage and note secured thereby, collect rents and payments on the indebtedness, and release portions of the property as payments were made, himself purchases a tract of the mortgaged land and credits the trust account with the purchase price, does not throw upon the mortgagor the duty of seeing that the payment is properly applied; but the beneficiaries for whom he holds the mortgage are chargeable with his neglect to apply the proceeds upon the indebtedness.

(June 11, 1907.)

A PPEAL by a portion of the defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Umatilla County in favor of plaintiff and one of the defendants in a suit to foreclose certain mortgages. Reversed.

Statement by King, C.:

This is a suit in equity by J. S. McLeod to foreclose three mortgages executed by Nancy E. Despain, Florence L. Berkeley, Bernice C. Dickson, Albert M. Despain, Edith Geraldine (Despain) Berkeley, together with Louise B. Despain, Eleanor M. Despain, and Constance A. Despain, minors, by their guardian, Nancy E. Despain, who, with Norborne Berkeley, H. Dickson, and Charles C. Berkeley, constitute the appellants herein. These mortgages were given to J. N. Teal to secure a note for $28,000, dated March 28, 1898, payable five years after date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, and, together with the note, were assigned to C. B. Wade, trustee, to secure certain other notes thereafter executed to him as such trustee, one of which was assigned to plaintiff, McLeod, and one to Lina H. Sturgis, who constitute the respondents herein. The remainder of the notes so executed were indorsed by Wade to other persons not parties to this suit. Lina H. Sturgis was made a party defendant and answered, asserting her claim in the mortgage to the extent of her interest therein, as evidenced by her note. Wade was made a nominal party defendant; but, not having been served with summons, made no appearance. Various other persons, not involved here, were also made defendants on account of interests claimed by them in the after-acquired mortgaged property. McLeod demands a decree foreclosing the mortgages to satisfy the sum of $7,000, with unpaid interest, while Sturgis prays a decree of foreclosure for an alleged unpaid balance of $1,157.45, with interest. Appellants, by their answer, allege that all of the notes and mortgages were paid in full to Wade as agent and trustee of respondents, and ask a decree dismissing the suit, together, with affirmative relief to the effect that all the notes referred to be declared paid and the mortgages canceled of record. A trial was had before the court, resulting in a decree in favor of the respondents, as prayed for, from which decree this appeal is taken.

Messrs. Wirt Minor, Charles Harrison Carter, and Thomas Griffin Halley for appellants.

Messrs. McCourt & Phelps, for respondent McLeod.

The word "trustee" is merely descriptive.

Bush v. Peckard, 3 Harr. (Del.) 385; Speelman v. Culbertson, 15 Ind. 441; Powell v. Morrison, 35 Mo. 244; Hatley v. Pike, 162 Ill. 241, 53 Am. St. Rep. 304, 44 N. E. 441.

Mr. James A. Fee for respondent Sturgis.

King, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts leading up to this suit, as we 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

gather them from the record, are substantially as follows: In March, 1898, appellants borrowed $28,000 from J. N. Teal, of Portland, Oregon, executing their promissory note therefor, payable to his order five years after its date at the Pendleton Savings Bank, Pendleton, Oregon, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum. To secure the payment of this note, three mortgages were also executed and duly recorded, covering certain lands in Umatilla county, Oregon. In June of the same year appellants, desiring to reduce the rate of interest and in order to sell their lands and apply the proceeds upon the indebtedness, wanted the privilege of paying the principal and interest before due, and, as Teal would not accede to these terms, but was willing to receive the full amount at any time, they made application for a loan to C. B. Wade, then cashier of the First National Bank, of Pendleton, Oregon. Norborne Berkeley testified that, as their agent, he made the application, and that the first time he spoke to Wade concerning the loan he answered: "We haven't got the money now, but can probably let you have it later;" that during the same week he renewed the request, and Wade replied: "I think we can get the money now, and will let you have it." After talking the matter over, he told Wade that, if he would buy the Teal note and hold it and allow them to pay it off in such sums as they could, it would suit them better than as it was, since they wanted to sell certain ranches and apply the proceeds on their obligation. Wade was to give them a lower rate of interest, and for his services in the transaction would charge $1,500, all of which was agreed to; and, after learning that Wade had received the note and mortgages from Teal, appellants executed eight promissory notes, made payable to "C. B. Wade, trustee," dated June 29, 1898, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, "on or before five years from date." The notes aggregated $29,500, as follows: Two for $7,000 each, and two for $2,500, two for $1,500, one for $3,500, and one for $4,000. One of the $1,500 notes represented the bonus to Wade. All the signatures of the new notes were procured within a short time after Wade received the Teal note and mortgages duly assigned. The new notes were accordingly turned over to him, and, with the exception of the bonus note, were duly assigned to the parties advancing the money.

As a part of the transaction, appellants and Wade entered into an agreement concerning the payment and disbursement of rents to be received on the property, which, on June 30, 1898, was reduced to writing, and, omitting the signatures, is as follows: "This agreement. made and entered into this 30th day of June, 1898, by and between N. E. Despain, Florence L. Berkeley and Norborne Berkeley, Jr., her husband, Bernice Dickson, and Haldane Dickson, her husband, Albert M. Despain, Edith G. Despain, and N. E. Despain as guardian of the persons and estates of Louise B. Despain, Eleanor Despain, and Constance A. Despain, minors, parties of the first part, and C. B. Wade, trustee, party of the second part, witnesseth: That, whereas the first parties have borrowed of C. B. Wade, trustee, party of the second part, twenty-eight thousand dollars ($28,000), payable on or before five years, and bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, said loan being secured by a note and mortgage for $28,000, which note is secured by a real-estate mortgage on certain city property in the city of Pendleton, and farm lands in Umatilla county, Oregon, same having been duly executed and delivered to J. N. Teal, of Portland, Oregon, by said first parties, and by said J. N. Teal duly assigned to second party hereunto, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and for the further security of said C. B. Wade, trustee, said first parties hereto do sell, transfer, set over, and assign to C. B. Wade, trustee, all the rents and profits of the property in the city of Pendleton, described in said mortgage, from said first parties to J. N. Teal, for the period of five years, unless said sum of twenty eight thousand dollars ($28,000), and interest thereon, shall have been sooner paid to said second party. First parties do further agree that they will, without expense to said second party, collect and deposit in the First National Bank, of Pendleton, Oregon, to the credit of the second party, the rents and profits of mortgaged property within limits of the city of Pendleton. And said second party agrees (1) that of moneys so deposited by said first parties, if same be sufficient therefor, he will pay or cause to be paid to N. E. Despain the sum of one hundred fifty dollars ($150) per month; (2) that he will pay interest on said loan semiannually; (3) that he will pay premiums on such fire insurance policies as may be procured, subject to approval of second party, by said first parties on property in city of Pendleton material to this agreement; and (4) that if, after such payments as hereinbefore set forth are paid, there remains any balance of such rents and profits, the same shall be paid on principal of said loan of twenty-eight thousand dollars ($28,000); provided, however, that, if first parties shall be unable to pay taxes assessed against said property, the party of first part may pay such taxes from such balance, if any there be." It appears that, after receiving the application, Wade spoke to McLeod, Sturgis, and others concerning it, explaining the time, terms, and conditions desired, and suggested that they advance the necessary money, indicating it would be a safe investment, for the reason he would procure an assignment of the note and mortgages from Teal to himself, as trustee; and, as an additional safeguard, he would arrange to have all rents from the property, together with receipts of sales of lands, if sold, paid to him, during the period of the loan, which he would apply in payment of the interest, when due, and credit the excess upon the principal. With this understanding, McLeod furnished $7,000, Lina H. Sturgis a like sum, while the balance of the funds was advanced by other parties not involved here. The money advanced, being sufficient for the desired purpose, amounting to $28,000, was paid over to Wade, who, with full knowledge, consent, and request of all concerned, paid the same to Teal. The assignment was in the usual form, dated June 29, 1898, and executed to "C. B. Wade, trustee;" the note being indorsed, "without recourse, to J. N. Teal."

The new notes were given for the purpose of indicating and specifying in writing the terms of payment of the obligation represented by the Teal note and mortgages, as well as to indicate the interest each of the parties advancing the money might have in the entire indebtedness and mortgage security, including the additional $1,500 bonus note given. These notes were executed, assigned, and accepted with the full knowledge and understanding of all the parties concerned that Wade, as trustee, was to hold the Teal note and mortgages, and neither the note nor mortgages should be deemed discharged until the amounts specified in the new notes should be fully paid. Wade accordingly entered upon his trust, retained possession of the Teal note and mortgages, received all rents and other proceeds from time to time, and, after paying the amounts excepted under the contract, credited the excess on the new notes until the $29,500, with interest, was paid, except the sums involved in this suit, all of which were paid to him to apply on the notes; but the money for which a decree is here demanded was neither credited thereon nor paid to the respondents. He so continued under the trust, without his right to do so being questioned, until September 8, 1903, when he became insolvent. After the execution of the new notes, they were indorsed by Wade to the various persons entitled thereto. McLeod retained his note in his possession, while the Sturgis note was held by Hartman as her agent; but all credits on these notes were placed there by

Wade, who was given the notes by the holders for that purpose as the money was paid to them. Prior to the date Wade's insolvency became known, tracts of the mortgaged land were sold from time to time, and releases duly executed by Wade, as trustee, and the moneys received therefor in accordance with the understanding and agreement between the parties concerned. During all this time and for many years prior thereto, Wade was cashier of the First National Bank of Pendleton, Oregon, and plaintiff, McLeod, was a director and stockholder only. The money was deposited in this bank as received, and entered on its books under the account of "Wade-Despain Trust." As payments were made to the holders of the notes, checks were given by Wade, signed "Wade-Despain Trust." Like checks were given for all other disbursements made by him under the written agreement. In this manner Wade kept a memorandum of moneys received and paid on the notes, as well as of all disbursements under the contract. When the notes were assigned to McLeod and Sturgis, Wade guaranteed the payment thereof in the following language, indorsed on the back of each note: "This note is secured by a note of $28,000, signed by the same parties, which is secured by real-estate mortgages assigned to C. B. Wade, trustee. For value received, I hereby guarantee payment of this note and waive protest, demand, notice of nonpayment thereof. C. B. Wade, Trustee."

It is urged by counsel for respondents that, during the entire transaction, and until his insolvency, Wade was the agent only of appellants, and that respondents are bona fide purchasers of the new notes, and that, by operation of law, these notes carry with them the Teal mortgages; that the new notes were intended to be substituted for the old, and, by oral agreement, these mortgages were to secure their payment; that this oral agreement is supplemented by the statement indorsed on the new notes given: "This note is secured by a note of $28,000, signed by the same parties, which is secured by real-estate mortgages assigned to C. B. Wade, trustee." Appellants' counsel insist that Wade was only respondents' trustee and agent, and that sufficient money having been paid him to cover the entire claim growing out of the deal, they were released from any further obligations. It appears that appellants' object in procuring the money with which to take up the Teal note and mortgages was for the purpose, first, of reducing the rate of interest from 8 per cent per annum to 7 per cent; second, to secure the privilege of paying the principal and interest at any time, and in order that the realty could be sold and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) mortgages released as sales were made, thereby enabling the indebtedness to be extinguished as soon as practicable. To accomplish these objects they were willing to pay a $1,500 bonus, and were not only willing to pay this additional sum, but consented to, and did enter into the agreement whereby all the rents and proceeds from sales should be paid to the holder of the mortgage security. With notice of these conditions, consisting of both actual and constructive knowledge, respondents advanced the money with which to purchase the Teal note and mortgages, and, as a means of segregating and evidencing the respective interests therein of each of the several persons advancing the money, as well as to show a change in the terms of payment and rate of interest, the new notes were given. The transaction was, in effect, the same as if all the new terms and conditions of payment were indorsed on the old note and mortgage, the difference being, under the method adopted, that each person, if desired, might hold the written instrument evidencing his or her interest, while leaving the security in Wade's possession, thereby making it more convenient for all, in that Wade could act as agent and trustee for each party represented. In this way the sales were to be facilitated as well as the payment of the indebtedness insured, and thereby carrying into effect one of the main objects in changing creditors. It is clearly apparent that the new notes were given and the negotiations perfected in this manner, and with this object in view. As evidence that there should be but the one debt, and that neither the Teal note nor mortgages should be deemed paid or canceled, all were assigned to Wade as trustee; and, to make certain that the note and mortgages should be kept alive, this fact was stamped on the back of the new notes, as executed. For the purpose of assuring the payment of the $1,500 promised him, Wade not only consented to act as trustee for the holders of the notes, but was willing to guarantee payment of the notes held by respondents, and accordingly indorsed the notes as guarantor, and, as such indorser, was personally bound, notwithstanding the fact that the word "trustee" was added to his name. Ogden R. Co. v. Wright, 31 Or. 150, 49 Pac. 975.

The date of the written agreement executed to Wade, as trustee, by appellants, is immaterial, as the transaction must be considered as a whole, even though it consumed more than one day. While there is no direct testimony that Sturgis had actual knowledge of such understanding, it does appear that McLeod relied upon an agreement to that effect.

On this point McLeod testified:

Q. Did he [Wade] tell you anything about having these other notes further secured by having the city rents turned over to him?

A. I asked him [Wade] how he was to pay the interest on these notes. He said the rents was to come to him, and, if any of the property was sold, they would apply it on these notes. That is the reason he gave on or before five years after date so that they could have a chance to sell it.

Q. He also told you he would have these rents assigned to him to apply on the notes?

A. He said he could pay the interest because he was getting the rents.

Q. They hadn't been going to him prior to that time, had they?

A. I don't know.

Q. As I understood you on direct examination, you said Mr. Wade told you he was collecting the rents; are you entirely correct in that?

A. Yes, sir; he said he was getting their rents.

Q. Didn't he tell you he would have these rents turned over to him so they could be applied on the interest?

A. Yes, sir; that is what he said, he was getting the rents.

Q. On his explanation to you of how this $28,000 note was assigned to him and held as security for the payment of the amount due on these others, you felt it was safe and you put up your money?

A. I thought so or I would not have done it.

Mr. Hartman, the agent of Sturgis, testified:

Q. He [Wade] was to hold that $28,000 note and mortgage to secure the payment of this?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was the agreement at the time?

A. Yes, sir; to be assigned by Despain and secured by this $28,000 mortgage.

Q. Wade was to hold it as trustee?

A. He was to hold it as security for this note.

Q. Do you know whether or not Mr. Wade collected the rents from this property?

A. I so understood it.

This testimony, taken together with the fact which is testified to by both McLeod and Hartman, that all the interest and moneys paid and credited on the notes came through Wade's hands and were indorsed thereon by him; that appellants' property was sold from time to time, and the mortgages released, with the full knowledge of both McLeod and the agent of Sturgis, and that all money received on the notes came 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from such sales and rents; that such sales were made and releases executed without objection on their part, and apparently with their approval, they receiving their portions of the money as applied in payment of interest, etc.,—all furnish strong evidence tending to show full knowledge and notice of all the conditions and terms under which the notes were executed.

But, if it be assumed, as contended by respondents' counsel, that the new notes were executed with the object of thereafter being indorsed and sold by Wade for the purpose of raising the money with which to take up the Teal note and mortgage, it must then be conceded that, for the purpose of making this sale and applying the proceeds as agreed, Wade for the time being was the agent of the Despains, and, in that respect, their trustee, and continued as such until the consummation of the sale of the notes and application of the proceeds as directed. It would then follow that the word "trustee" was added that it might be known there was a cestui que trust, and that conditions were to be performed by the trustee for the beneficiaries. Then would not this word attached to the payee's name impart notice, or at least be sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry, as to the terms and conditions under which the trust was created? In Wills v. Wilson, 3 Or. 310, the court states the rule to be that, "when the circumstances are such as would excite suspicion and naturally attract the attention, a party will be presumed to have been put upon inquiry, and, if he does not inquire, he will be presumed to have known the facts." To the same effect are Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Parsons, 54 Minn. 56, 40 Am. St. Rep. 299, 55 N. W. 825, and Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 97 Am. Dec. 107, 1 Am. Rep. 115. In the case at bar respondents concede that they entered into a combination with several other parties to furnish the money with which to take up the $28,000 note and mortgages securing it. It clearly appears from the evidence that, in order to do so safely and satisfactorily to all concerned, many conditions were involved. The old note with mortgages securing it was to be assigned to Wade as trustee, to be held to secure the assignees of the new notes which were to be given. He was to receive notes, specifying the various interests of each, with new terms included, and assign them to the various parties advancing the money, as their interest would appear. All the money so furnished was to pass through Wade's hands. In brief, Wade was to be the "go-between" for all parties until the transaction was completed. He became agent for Teal in holding the note and mortgages until the money was paid, and, under respondents' contention, agent for appellants in procuring the funds to pay Teal, as well as agent for respondents to invest their money. These circumstances, taken together with the word "trustee" added to his name in the notes, were certainly sufficient to attract attention and cause an average business man to closely scrutinize all the terms and conditions under which the entire deal was consummated.

In Shaw v. Spencer, supra, Mr. Justice Foster, in discussing this question, says: "Notice of the existence of a trust is, by all the authorities, held to impose the duty of inquiry as to its character and limitations; and whatever is sufficient to put a person of ordinary prudence upon inquiry is constructive notice of everything to which that inquiry might have led." Among authorities to the same effect are: Randolph, Com. Paper, 1st ed. § 444; Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 271; Prather v. Weissinger, 10 Bush, 117; Gaston v. American Exch. Nat. Bank, 29 N. J. Eq. 98; Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall. 165, 175, 21 L. ed. 142, 145; Union P. R. Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576, 577, 24 L. ed. 391, 392; Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Insurance Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693; 34 Cent. L. J. 45; Smith v. Burgess, 133 Mass. 511; Third Nat. Bank v. Lange, 51 Md. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 304. A few states appear to hold to the contrary rule. Indiana and Missouri are cited as holding that words of this nature affixed to the name of a payee are merely descriptio personæ. Speelman v. Culbertson, 15 Ind. 441; Powell v. Morrison, 35 Mo. 244. The consideration and criticism of these cases by subsequent decisions weaken them as precedents. In Speelman v. Culbertson, supra, the words, "administrators of the estate of John Babcock, deceased," appeared after the names of the payees; while in Powell v. Morrison, supra, the note was payable to one "James Castello, sheriff of St. Louis County." The court in announcing the opinion manifests much doubt as to the correctness of its position, while one of their number dissents. In discussing this question in Payne v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Mo. App. 377, Mr. Justice Biggs, speaking for the court, says: "There is a class of cases in this state which hold that a note, payable to a person as executor, guardian, agent, or sheriff, is prima facie the payee's individual property; that the words 'executor,' 'guardian,' etc., are merely descriptio personæ; and that such words are not sufficient within themselves to put a purchaser of such a note on inquiry as to the conditions or limitations (if any) of the payee's power to pledge or sell [citing authorities of that state]. The doctrine of the foregoing cases has for its foundation the reason that, in the execution of such trusts, the law contemplates that it will be necessary to collect or sell the trust property. Upon this reason, the prima facie right of such payee to make any kind of disposition of the note is predicated. But, in our opinion, these cases are not applicable when the negotiation of instruments, or the sale of other property held by a trustee, is involved, and the instrument upon its face discloses the beneficial interest of another." This authority, after quoting with approval from Shaw v. Spencer and Duncan v. Jaudon, supra, adds: "These authorities are sufficient to show that the powers of a trustee as to the disposition of trust property are quite the reverse of those of an executor, guardian, or sheriff." The appellate court of Missouri, in Sparrow v. State Exch. Bank, 103 Mo. App. 347, 77 S. W. 170, also observes: "It must be confessed that the rule declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra, and the cases in which it has been followed by that court, cannot be reconciled with that declared in the Missouri cases already alluded to. If the question here had not been authoritatively ruled by our own supreme court, we should be inclined to adopt that declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, since the reasoning in those cases by that great court in favor of the rule therein announced, it seems, are of the most cogent and persuasive nature."

We find on examination of the cases sustaining respondents' contention on this point that most of the authorities upholding that view manifest some doubt as to the soundness of their position. This point has not heretofore been directly before this court; but we find the great weight of authority, as well as the better reasoning, supports the rule that the word "trustee," added to a payee's name in a written instrument, is sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry as to all the terms and conditions under which it may have been executed, and, in the absence of such inquiry, knowledge thereof will be presumed. We also deem a recognition of this rule necessary to properly protect the beneficiaries of such trusts; otherwise, under the claim of being a bona fide purchaser through the neglect of the assignee of an instrument to make inquiry, the cestuis que trust in many instances would, without fault on their part, suffer great loss. The adoption of the rule here recognized protects the innocent without hardship to investors; while the contrary doctrine offers an inducement to purchasers of this kind of property to neglect making inquiry as to the import of the word "trustee," by which the innocent must often sufthority, defendant was liable. On appeal, this decision was reversed, the court holding that, as plaintiff left the bond and mortgage with Purdy for safekeeping, and evidently permitted it to remain for other purposes, allowed payments to be made upon it to Purdy, received the amount of these payments from him and suffered him to indorse them upon the bond, it would be deemed from these facts, coupled with the circumstances attending the origin of the bond and mortgage, that authority to Purdy to receive payments was implied; and observes: "I do not perceive that, if the defendant had taken the precaution to call for the production of the papers whenever he made a payment, he would have strengthened this implication. The authority is implied from the possession of the papers and the continued receipt of money upon them, which are facts, and not from the exhibition of the papers by the agent, which is only the evidence of the facts. . . . To have called for the bond and mortgage under the circumstances of this case would have been a very prudent and proper precaution, but it would have been only a precaution. It would have enabled the defendant to verify the authority of Purdy, but it would have been no more than verifying it."

After a careful consideration of the evidence, as disclosed by the record and law applicable thereto, we can reach no other conclusion than that Wade was the agent of respondents with full authority to collect the sums represented by the notes given, and so collected the money which was paid to him in trust for the benefit of respondents with their full knowledge and assent; and that sufficient having been paid to him in that capacity to cancel the principal and interest of all the notes given, they, together with the mortgages, should be canceled. The prayer of the answers to that effect should, therefore, be granted.

The decree of the court below should be reversed, and one entered here in accordance with these views.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, King, C., on December 31, 1907, handed down the following additional opinion:

Respondents, in their petition for rehearing, contend that we were in error in the statement in our former opinion to the effect that the signatures to the eight promissory notes, made payable to the order of C. B. Wade, trustee, were procured, and notes delivered, after he received the Teal note and mortgages duly assigned to him. It is true that the assignment of the Teal instruments, as well as of the new notes, are dated June 20, 1898, and the written agreement between Wade and appellants is dated the day following; and, while the $28,000 draft may have been forwarded to Teal by the Pendleton Savings Bank on July 1st, the money was actually paid to the bank for that purpose, and assignment of note and mortgages recorded, June 30, 1898. It is evident that respondents' counsel make no distinction between the dates as they appear on the instruments in evidence, and the actual time when the various steps were taken, and that they overlook the governing feature that the various transactions, although requiring several days for completion, must be considered as a whole.

On these points various facts and circumstances sustain the conclusion heretofore reached, an instance of which we quote from the testimony of Norborne Berkeley as follows:

Q. At the time this transaction was made, in what capacity, if any, were you acting for Mrs. Despain and the other defendants?

A. I was acting as their agent in handling the affairs of the Despain estate.

Q. Tell the court how it occurred.

A. We owed Mr. Teal, or rather Mr. D. P. Thompson, I think, by a note made to J. N. Teal, $28,000. I thought there was an understanding we could pay part of it off, and I wrote to Teal and asked if we could sell a ranch and apply the money, and he said, "No." I thought that possibly we might get the money somewhere else, and I went to Mr. Wade. The first time I asked him if he could let us have $28,000, he said: "No, we haven't got the money now, but can probably let you have it later." And, probably during the same week, I went back to ask him about it, and he said: "Yes, I think we can get the money now, and will let you have it." I told him: "If you will buy this note and hold it and allow us to pay it off in such sums as we can, it will suit us better, as we want to sell certain ranches and apply it whenever we can." He was to give us a lower rate of interest. We were paying 8 per cent, and he agreed to let us have it for 7, for which he would charge us $1,500. When Mr. Wade told me they had the money, I went down there, and he had some notes prepared in the bank, aggregating $29,500. The understanding was the first one of the notes paid was to be the bonus note paid to get the money, and get the concession of interest, and to be allowed to pay the matter off as we wanted to. We had been informed that Mr. Teal had sent his note and assignment of his mortgage to the savings bank, so Wade informed me when we went in there. We went down, and he took up the note and assignment of the mortgage, and when we got back he showed me he had this note in his possession. I surrendered him the $29,500 note, or notes, with the understanding they should be kept together.

Q. Were you acting for them as agent in this transaction?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You knew those notes were to raise that money to pay off that loan of Teal's?

A. No, I didn't know that they really owed the money before he got the notes; that is, he had the Teal assignment and Teal note before the notes were delivered to him.

Q. You say he had the money when the assignment was delivered to him. How do you know that?

A. I didn't say he had the money. I said he had the $28,000 note and assignment of mortgage when the notes were delivered to him.

It is argued that McLeod received his note June 29, 1898, and our attention is directed to certain testimony in support of this contention; but the answers cited do not support this theory, nor do we find anything in the record to that effect. True, it is disclosed that McLeod gave a check to Wade on that date for $7,000, for which he was to receive a note to be executed by appellants; but he does not state that the note was turned over at that time, and it is clear, from the record, that all the money necessary for taking up the Teal note and mortgages was advanced to Wade, and that the Teal instruments had been assigned to and were held by him as trustee when this was done. All of this is consistent with Berkeley's statement to the effect that, when Wade told him he had the money, the notes were then prepared, and, on learning he had the assignment of the $28,000 note and mortgages, the new notes were then delivered to him. McLeod's check, dated, June 29th, is shown by the stamp of the bank thereon to have been cashed the following day. The testimony of both McLeod and Hartman indicates that it was the understanding between all the parties that the new notes should be secured by an assignment of the Teal note and mortgages to Wade, as trustee, and should be held by him in that capacity; the legal title to remain in him until the $29,500 consideration expressed in the new instruments should be paid in full, during all of which time the old note and mortgages should continue in full force and effect. By mutual consent he thereby became the holder and owner of the legal title to the indebtedness, as well as the party with whom defendants were expected to deal and to whom they were to make their payments. The claim of $29,500 was, accordingly, represented by the various instruments in the aggregate, and, as formerly stated, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) was in the same position as if the contents, conditions, and effect of all the new instruments and agreements had been written across, or attached to, the old note, and securities and made a part thereof, though the method adopted was more convenient by reason of the separate notes representing and distinguishing their respective interests, etc. It is, accordingly, immaterial whether the signatures of the new notes were secured before or after June 29th, as they were of no binding effect until the entire transaction, including the assignment of the Teal note and mortgages, became complete, which, by relation, antedates the delivery of the notes, and which fact respondents are estopped to question, since the new notes, on which a decree is here sought, contained the indorsement: "This note is secured by a note of $28,000, signed by same parties, which is secured by real-estate mortgages assigned to C. B. Wade, trustee." It is conceded that this indorsement was upon these notes at the time of their delivery. In fact, it is through this indorsement that respondents maintain their rights to foreclose the Teal mortgages.

It is also necessarily conceded that the old note and mortgages remained in force at least until the new notes were executed, which being true, it follows that, when the new notes were delivered, the Teal note and mortgages, by reason thereof, were either paid or not paid. If not paid, they then remained in full force and effect until the entire indebtedness was liquidated, and, Wade having been made their custodian, and it having been required, as a part of the conditions upon which the money was advanced, that he should hold the same for respondents, it cannot be seriously questioned but that the payments made under such circumstances were made to the party authorized to receive them, and respondents would be bound accordingly. In that event, it would become a purchase outright, concerning which respondents would necessarily be bound by Wade's acts; as much so as if the money advanced had been furnished without the execution and receipt of the new instruments. On the other hand, if the execution of the new notes paid the old debt, it would follow that the former note and mortgages became extinguished, and, while the new notes contain the indorsement that they are secured by the Teal instruments, yet, if paid and extinguished, this fact could be admissible only for the purpose of proving an oral agreement to execute a mortgage to secure the payment of the money advanced, or, what is its equivalent, an oral agreement to revive a mortgage that has been fully paid, to include not only the canceled claim, but an additional note of $1,500. Whether such agreement could be enforced in equity is not necessary to a determination of this suit. It is sufficient to observe that respondents do not seek a specific performance of such contract, nor is an issue to that effect disclosed by the pleadings.

But it appears here that the mortgages and note were duly assigned to Wade, and that Teal was paid in full by him with funds advanced by respondents for that purpose, thereby, up to that point, making it a purchase outright. Then, as evidence of the fact that neither the mortgages nor the note were deemed canceled, it was expressly understood and agreed, and so stamped upon each note issued, that it was secured by the old note and mortgages, thus clearly indicating that each was to remain in force and effect, to be available at any time there should be a default in the payment of any portion thereof, in accordance with the terms of the new notes, which not only secured the interest of each of the parties advancing the money with which the Teal note and mortgages were purchased, but contained the additional terms in reference to the interest and the time of payment granted to appellants. We thus find them retaining and using the old note and mortgages through Wade, as holder of the legal title, with which to secure the indebtedness represented by the new instrument. The illustration given by Sturgis's counsel, where a party may be made a trustee by mere operation of law to protect innocent holders of negotiable instruments, is not applicable to the case at bar. The notes here involved are held by persons who, in law as well as in fact, are parties to the agreement whereby Wade was made their trustee, and where, by express agreement stamped on the notes, it is provided that the old instruments shall secure the payment thereof, and that this security was to be held by this expressly created trustee. In the one instance the trustee is created by operation of law, and, in the other, by an express and implied agreement of all concerned. The act of Wade (in his effort to perfect the deal and thereby make certain the $1,500 bonus, which he would otherwise have lost), in guaranteeing the payment of some of the notes, is not in any manner inconsistent with his position as agent for respondents during the transaction as well as after it became complete. Nor are we aware of any rule precluding an agent from guaranteeing to his principal the payment of claims handled by him for such principal, especially, as in this case, where the agent was to be one of the beneficiaries in conjunction with the parties whom he was to and did represent. In this case, it appears that he was not only willing to guarantee the payment of some of the notes, but also consented to retain the old note and mortgage security, and that he received moneys from time to time, all of which constituted a means of aiding and insuring the payment of not only the full amount of money advanced, with interest, to the parties furnishing it, but his bonus as well, in proportion to the respective interests of each, thereby furnishing additional security to respondents for the money advanced by them. It is hardly possible, nor is it reasonable, to assume that Wade was acting in any other capacity than as their agent, or to assume that, after the transaction was completed, he was agent for appellants in reference to matters here involved, for to do so would be to accept the conclusion that respondents adopted an extremely unbusinesslike method in this instance by retaining only the new notes, and through Wade, as appellants' agent, permitting the payors and mortgagors to retain the mortgage security. The mere statement of this theory is sufficient for its answer.

It is also urged that there is nothing in the evidence of either of the parties indicating any agreement to the effect that the proceeds of the sale of the lands should be paid to Wade, and by him applied on the mortgage indebtedness; it being insisted that the proceeds received from the rent only could be thus considered. After a re-examination of the testimony, we find that the conclusion reached on this point in our former opinion is not only clearly deducible from the proceedings taken as a whole, but is manifest from the testimony of McLeod, as well as of Hartman, Sturgis's agent.

McLeod, after stating that Wade was to hold the old note and mortgage as security for the notes, was asked:

Q. Did he tell you anything about having these other notes further secured by having the city rents turned over to him?

A. I asked how he was to pay the interest on these notes. He said the rents was to come to him, and, if any of the property was sold, they would apply it on these notes. That is the reason he gave on or before five years after date, so they could have a chance to sell it.

Q. He also told you he would have these rents assigned to him to apply on the notes?

A. He said he could pay the interest because he was getting the rents.

Q. How did you get your interest payments you have on there? How was it paid to you and by whom?

A. He gave that credit on the back of them, and he made a memorandum of it always and held it, and always gave me credit on the back for it.

Q. Then you would bring in the note, and he would indorse the amount on the back?

A. Yes, sir.

That McLeod knew of the transactions going on, and received the benefits, without objection, is manifested by the following question propounded to him, and his answer thereto: "Did you ask him (Wade) about any releases of mortgages he had made at any time? A. He said he was releasing property." That Sturgis knew of the transactions, and with such knowledge recognized Wade as her agent and received the benefits thereof during all of this time, clearly appears from the various facts and circumstances disclosed by the record, for example: She authorized Wade to draw $7,000 from her bank account with which to procure the Teal note and mortgages securing the same. Both she and McLeod understood that Wade should collect and receive the rents of the mortgaged property, that the debt should be paid in instalments, and that Wade would hold the Teal mortgages as security for respondents' notes. They were largely interested in the bank in which he was cashier and trusted him with the money.

They went to him for their payments, and never approached the appellants, or any of them, and, in addition to these circumstances, Mr. Hartman, the agent of Sturgis, says:

Q. Tell us what Mr. Wade told you about that note.

A. He said he was taking it up,—this large note of Teal's for $28,000,—and wanted to handle it here at a reduced rate of interest, so that when the rents were collected, and any property sold, it could be applied on the payment of the notes in partial payments.

Here we have the purpose made known to Hartman before the deal was consummated, which, being followed with the making of Wade trustee for all, and acceptance of the note with statement indorsed thereon, through which she, with others interested, seek this foreclosure, makes the conclusion inevitable that Sturgis, with other respondents, in law, as well as in fact, recognized Wade as her agent; and, while Wade, during the transaction until its completion, was the pivot around which all the parties to the deal were acting, and to whom they looked for its proper consummation, his relationship with appellants, so far as the questions here involved were concerned, was at an end on its completion, and he thereafter continued as the agent of respondents only. He was made the custodian of, and held the legal title to, the Teal note and mortgages on which appellants, by agreement, oral and written, were bound to pay 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

all rents and proceeds of sales to him, and, in accordance therewith, all payments were made to him, which acts respondents, to say the least, impliedly approved and did not question so long as they received the benefits, but seek to avoid that part of the arrangements, thus made and recognized, which may appear to be to their injury. It is settled that such cannot be sanctioned by courts of equity. Respondents, under such circumstances, are estopped from questioning Wade's authority to receive payments from defendants on this indebtedness, and that he was acting as their agent throughout the proceeding. It is too well settled to admit of serious discussion that the principal must adopt or reject the act of his agent as an entirety, and cannot receive the benefit of such agency without bearing its burdens. Coleman v. Stark, 1 Or. 116; La Grande Nat. Bank v. Blum, 27 Or. 215, 41 Pac. 659.

We are quoted, in effect, as saying that all oral agreements between the parties were subsequently reduced to writing. In this deduction counsel are in error; our statement being that, as a part of the transaction, an agreement was entered into concerning the collection and disbursement of rents, which was afterwards reduced to writing, being the instrument there quoted. But we neither said, nor meant to say, that all the transactions were included in the written contract, as many took place afterwards. Nor was it necessary, under the status of the parties at the time suit was brought, that the written instruments should have included all dealings between them. Lands were sold and mortgages released, and the proceeds thereof having been accepted, and the oral agreements executed and acted upon, is sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. In fact, it is too well settled to admit of serious doubt that agreements, whether oral or partly oral only, when once executed, are binding on all parties thereto. As formerly stated, the old note, although in Wade's possession, is treated and recognized, not as evidence merely, but as having sufficient life to continue the mortgages in force and to entitle respondents to maintain this suit for their foreclosure, but for all other purposes is treated as extinguished, for, if available only as evidence of the existence and effect of the mortgages, it is to no purpose, as it could only tend to prove an intent to revive a canceled instrument, for which purpose it would be insufficient. In this connection, it must be remembered that this is not an action on the notes, but a suit to foreclose the mortgages.

It is urged by counsel for Mrs. Sturgis that, as she did not file this suit, the statement in our former opinion to the above effect, to use counsel's language, "has been washed away by an avalanche from the record itself." True, she did not bring this suit, and appears only as one of the defendants; but, notwithstanding that feature, she has no interest in common with appellants, and was made a defendant only because of having an interest in the subject-matter involved, and by reason of refusing to join as one of the plaintiffs. Although a defendant, she affirmatively pleads and formally sets up her interests, and makes similar averments and seeks the same relief as the plaintiffs. From this, it follows that, whether she be termed a plaintiff or defendant, or whether she joined in the filing of the suit, or subsequently saw proper to move and assert similar rights in the same manner through the same source, it is immaterial, and, to say the most in favor of counsel's contention in this respect, is what might be termed a "distinction without a difference." The inconsistency of her position is manifest, whether we say, "for the purpose of bringing this suit," etc., or adjust our statement to what is, in effect, counsel's position on this point, and say, "for the purpose of seeking a decree of foreclosure in her favor, she recognizes the old note as having sufficient life to entitle her to foreclose the mortgages for which she recognizes Wade as her trustee, but considers the note extinguished, and denies Wade's trusteeship for any other purpose."

The transactions shown in this case clearly bring it within the principles announced and recognized in Wills v. Wilson, 3 Or. 308; Coleman v. Stark and La Grande Nat. Bank v. Blum, supra; Swegle v. Wells, 7 Or. 222. And these decisions on the points here involved are in harmony with the great weight of cases in this country, many of which are cited in our former opinion. As is in effect clearly held in Swegle v. Wells, supra, "the ordinary rules relating to commercial paper," referred to by counsel for McLeod, cannot apply to such cases; nor can it make any difference that the verdict of the jury in that case, to which our attention is directed, was left undisturbed, as the conclusion here reached is in harmony with the result there, both as to the law and the facts under consideration.

Other points upon the merits are urged by counsel for respondents, but all of them, like some we have here re-examined, are discussed in our former opinion, and sufficient reasons are not advanced to entitle them to further consideration. Our attention, however, has been especially directed to the moneys paid to Wade by appellants, concerning which it is maintained that his receipts are insufficient to cancel the indebtedness. In this connection, our attention is called to the "Wade-Despain trust account," by reason of which it is claimed that an agency is shown between Wade and defendants; that it shows a deposit to the credit of that account of $46,313.78 and a payment to the owners of the new notes of but $18,650; that this account discloses $7,000 yet due on the McLeod note, and $1,157.45 on the Sturgis note; and that the balance of the deposits was applied in payment of interest on the notes, taxes, and insurance for defendants, including moneys paid to the Berkeleys and Despains and in the cancellation of a certain note and mortgage on defendants' property in Union county, showing disbursements from this fund of $1,501 more than received. The fallacy in this contention lies in assuming that appellants are bound by everything shown by the books and checks relative to the Wade-Despain trust account. This account was adopted by Wade after he had entered upon his duties as trustee for the holders of the new notes, and was merely a method adopted for his own convenience, over which appellants had no control. The money was paid to Wade, out of which certain sums were to be first paid, such as the $150 per month to Mrs. Despain and payment of taxes, etc., in accordance with the understanding of all; but it was immaterial to her, as well as to the other appellants, as to how the account was kept in the bank after having been paid to the party entitled to receive it. All in excess of the sums to be expended under the written agreement was paid to him for the purpose of reducing the principal and interest on the indebtedness covered by the mortgages, and was under the control of Wade only. He held the mortgages and original note, neither of which was extinguished until fully paid. Appellants, accordingly, paid the money to the holder of the legal title thereof, and it was not incumbent upon them to see that it was credited on the proper instrument. Swegle v. Wells, supra; Hatfield v. Reynolds, 34 Barb. 612. The question as to the application of moneys received on the debt when collected by Wade became a matter between him and respondents only, and, if applied as it should have been, the debt was canceled, while, if not so applied, the effect, so far as the same may affect appellants, must be determined according to, and under, the well-known maxim that "equity looks upon that as done which should have been done," which would entitle the notes and mortgages to cancellation. In respect therefore to this account, it was opened by Wade as a trustee, and he thereby became the depositor, and, as such, alone had authority to draw upon it. A large part of the money deposited to the credit of this account is shown to have been paid to him by check, which checks were made payable to his order as trustee. The money therefore paid to, and received by, him was received in his trust capacity, and, so far as any part thereof was paid to appellants or disbursed on expenses of the trust, they are properly chargeable, but, so far as not thus paid, are chargeable against respondents. The books, statements, etc., showing the condition of the account, constitute admissions against his interest as trustee. and, as such, was properly admitted in evidence for the purpose of showing the payments to him to be applied on appellants' indebtedness, for which they are accordingly entitled to credit thereon to the full amount of the sums shown by this account, as well as those disclosed by any other statements or receipts to have been received by him, in excess of disbursements made to and for them under their agreement. The moneys therefore drawn from this account, which are properly chargeable to the appellants, are the sums paid to Mrs. Despain for her support, to the Berkeleys for collecting rents, and for taxes, insurance, repairs, etc., amounting to $17,756.50.

After a careful re-examination of the accounts, statements, deposit books, etc., showing receipts and disbursements by Wade, under his trust, we find the sums for which respondents are chargeable to be as follows: June 29, 1898, eight notes payable to Wade, as trustee, aggregating $29,500; interest on same to December 30, 1904, date of last credit, $13,422.50; aggregate amount paid to N. E. Despain, $8,500; amount paid to Norborne Berkeley, $1,470.75; amount paid to C. Berkeley, $129.35; amount paid for insurance, taxes, repairs, etc., $4,644.04; aggregate interest on last four sums (approximate), $3,425,—total, $61,091.64. Moneys received by Wade, as trustee, from appellants and their agents, are as follows: Between July 29, 1898, and September 11, 1903, cash from Snyder, $13,685.69; July 18, 1898, cash from La Fontaine, $5,500; March 7, 1899, paid to C. B. Wade from sale of Grande Ronde ranch, $8,000; March 30, 1899, from sale of other property, $3,500; September 4, 1899, cash from Campbell from sale of land, $302; September 8, 1903, cash from Florence Berkeley, $1,408; December 8, 1903, cash from Peringer, $1,050.84; aggregate amount of interest on these payments from date of each thereof, $11,414.80; total amount of rents collected, $17,756.50,—total credits, $62,617.83. It will be observed, therefore, from the statements, books, etc., introduced in evidence, that Wade, as trustee, received from appellants and for respondents, to be applied in the payment of the instruments secured by the mortgages, about $1,200 more than sufficient for the cancellation thereof.

It is urged, however, that the item of $3,500 was a loan to Wade by appellants, and that they should not be credited with this item; but we find nothing in the record to justify this inference, nor is there anything in the statement made by Berkeley to Hartman, testified to, when considered in connection with Berkeley's explanation thereof, to justify such conclusion. In fact, the receipt itself, which it is conceded was given for the money, is sufficient to rebut counsel's theory; it being as follows:

Pendleton, Oregon, Mch. 30, 1899.

Received from the Despain estate on account of Wade trustee mortgage, against the estate property, thirty-five hundred dollars to be applied on notes in final settlement—interest in accordance with terms of mortgage.

C. B. Wade, Trustee.

It is also contended that the $8,000 received from the sale of the Grande Ronde ranch should not be applied on respondents' claim. This again overlooks the legal effect of the agreement by which Wade was made the holder of the legal title to the Teal note and mortgages, which were not to be deemed canceled until the entire amount represented therein should be paid. The evidence discloses that this land was sold and deeded to Wade by the Despains for the consideration of $8,000 over and above the mortgage liens thereon, under an express agreement that this sum should be applied on the mortgage indebtedness held by him against them, and that the deposit books of the Wade-Despain trust account show that he received this money from them, placing it to the credit of this fund. This transaction was the same in effect as if the Despains had sold the farm, subject to the mortgage, to any other person, and paid the $8,000 received therefor to Wade on the mortgages, and he, in place of paying it to respondents under his trust, had loaned it to the purchaser, or to any other person with which either to cancel the lien on the farm sold or for any other purpose. In short, the question as to what he may have done with this or any other fund received from appellants for application on the mortgage indebtedness became, under the record herein, a matter for adjustment between the respondents and Wade, as their agent, and could not, as a matter of law, concern appellants.

Under any construction that may reasonably be applied to the evidence, as well as from any inference that may logically be deduced from the record, it appears that more than sufficient funds have been paid to the Esq., now cashier of the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, J. M. Brownson, Esq., now in the employment of Messrs. Shoenberger, Speir and Co., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and Anthony J. Antello, Esq., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, as co-executors of this my last will and testament, for all that portion of my estate, real and personal, and effects and interests in the states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky and Illinois, and of any property that may be transferred to them upon the close of the administration of my estate in the state of New York by my executors hereinbefore appointed by me for that state." The entire personal estate of the decedent remaining after the provision for his wife, together with the proceeds of his real estate, which he directed his Pennsylvania executors to convert into money, passed into their hands. They filed nine accounts in the court below; the last involving nothing but the residuary estate. All of the pecuniary legacies, except those given in the residuary clause, were paid on the adjudications of the prior accounts; the eighth having been adjudicated on December 10, 1897. At that time there was a balance of $81,332.39, and it was directed to be held for a further account. It is concluded in the last account, showing a fund in the hands of the accountants of $272,276.63, out of which they are directed to pay to the appellant a bequest of $250,000.

Though the bulk of the personal estate of the testator, including the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, passed into the hands of the Pennsylvania executors, the commonwealth made no claim for collateral-inheritance tax on the legacies heretofore paid by them, amounting to $1,326,000. In October, 1891, a collateral-inheritance tax of $25,750 was paid "as per compromise" on $515,000, the appraised value of testator's real estate situated in this state, and, on the final distribution of the residuary estate, the court below deducted $12,500, or 5 per cent, from the bequest to the appellant, holding that, though the commonwealth had not been entitled to the tax of $25,750 paid on the real estate, the appellant's legacy of $250,000 was liable to tax under Lewis's Estate, 203 Pa. 211, 52 Atl. 205, and deducted the same from it. to the relief of the final distributees of the residuary estate. The single question before us is the correctness of this ruling. From all that appears, the collateral-inheritance tax of $25,750 may have been paid upon the real estate of the testator, which he specifically devised; but, assuming it to have been upon that sold by the executors, the learned judge of the orphans' court correctly held that the commonwealth was not entitled to collateral-inheritance tax upon it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(Coleman's Estate, 169 Pa. 231, 28 Atl. 137), and, this being so, Lewis's Estate is not authority for relieving the final distributees at the expense of the appellant.

The final distributees of the residuary estate having permitted the tax of $25,750 to be paid to the commonwealth, they cannot now ask that $12,500 be deducted from appellant's legacy, to their relief. They ought to have protected themselves at the proper time. Even if the tax had been properly paid, there is no reason why appellant's legacy should bear the burden of nearly half of it, instead of its just proportion, as one of many legacies amounting in the aggregate to more than $1,500,000.

The liability of the property of a decedent to collateral-inheritance tax is to be determined by its situs at the time of his death. The words of our collateral-inheritance tax act of May 6, 1887 (P. L. 79), are: "All estates, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind whatsoever, situated within this state, whether the person or persons dying seised thereof be domiciled within or out of this state, and all such estates situated in another state, territory, or country, when the person or persons dying seised thereof shall have their domicile within this commonwealth, passing from any person who may die seised or possessed of such estates, either by will, or under the intestate laws of this state, or any part of such estate, or estates, or interest therein, transferred by deed, grant, bargain, or sale, made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment, after the death of the grantor or bargainor,* to any person or persons, or to bodies corporate or politic, in trust or otherwise, other than to or for the use of father, mother, husband, wife, children, and lineal descendants born in lawful wedlock, or the wife or widow of the son of the person dying seised or possessed thereof, shall be and they are hereby made subject to a tax of $5 on every $100 of the clear value of such estate or estates." The situs of the personal property of this testator at the time of his death was in New York, for it was all actually "situated" there, except the proceeds of the real estate which he directed to be converted into money; and this must be regarded as part of his personal estate situated in his domicile, for the status of property at the instant of death must govern the question of tax. Re Handley, 181 Pa. 339, 37 Atl. 587. At the instant of the testator's death, his real estate, which he had directed to be converted into money, became, by operation of law, so converted, and all of the personal estate belonging to him was therefore either actually or by legal fiction within the state of New York. None of it having been "situated" here at the time of his death, the commonwealth had no claim upon it for collateral-inheritance tax. The domicile of the testator, at the time of his death, was the situs of his personal estate, and that situs, and not what he directed to be done with his estate, is the sole test of the right of this sovereignty to tax it. The state taxes, and can tax, only what is within it at the time of the death of the owner of it. Lewis's Estate—not a convincing authority—was decided upon its own peculiar facts, and is not to be stretched, as it manifestly was by the court below, in extending it to the present case. The actual situs of the property of Harriet E. Lewis, which she directed to be distributed among collateral legatees, was at the time of her death, and had been for many years prior thereto, within this state, in the custody and control of her agents here, empowered to invest and reinvest it, and the executor, legatees, and foreign creditors requested that there should be in Luzerne county, through its orphans' court, "a complete administration and distribution of the whole estate comprehended in the account." No such situation is presented here, and there is not even the analogy which the learned judge below seemed to think existed of "the legatee now coming, by counsel, before the court and asking for payment in full." The appellant did not even appear before the adjudicating judge to claim the legacy, according to the appearances noted by him. Its first appearance by counsel, so far as can be gathered from the record, was before the court in banc on exceptions to the adjudication, to resist the attempt of the appellees to have $12,500 deducted from its legacy.

The decree of the court below is reversed, the exceptions to the adjudication are overruled, and the same is confirmed; the costs on this appeal to be paid by the appellees.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF WILLIAM R. LINE, Deceased.

APPEAL OF LUTE A. LINE.

Wills — half-brother — rights.

1. A half-brother takes no interest in testator's real estate under a will directing the estate to be divided among testator's heirs according to the intestate laws, where such laws permit persons of half blood to share in personalty but not in realty, although the will refers to him as "my brother," and a codicil gives him certain stock in addition to what has been given him as heir or distributee under the will.

Same — heirs — meaning.

2. The word "heirs" in a will may be 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held to refer to those who should participate in personalty as well as in realty, where the intention was to dispose of the whole property; and an interpretation which would exclude them from sharing in personalty would result in intestacy as to the major part of the estate.

(May 11, 1908.)

APPEAL by exceptant from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Cumberland County dismissing exceptions to the report of the auditor appointed to distribute the fund in the hands of the executors of William R. Line, deceased, which refused to recognize exceptant's right to share in decedent's realty. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. M. Biddle, Jr., for appellant:

The intention of a testator, expressed in his will, and fairly drawn from it, must govern the construction of it.

Graham v. Graham, 3 Clark (Pa.) 216; Baker's Appeal, 115 Pa. 593, 8 Atl. 630; Ashburner's Estate, 159 Pa. 545, 28 Atl. 361; Wright v. Brotherton, 2 Rawle, 133;

Note. — Research has disclosed no other case in which the effect of a reference to a brother or sister of the half blood as a "brother" or "sister," upon the right to take under a devise or bequest to "heirs" or "next of kin," has been considered. The question is, of course, purely one of the testator's intention; and instances are not wanting in which reference to a person not properly belonging in a class, as being a member of that class, has been held to entitle him to take under a subsequent gift to the class. See, for example, the case of Hall v. Wiggint, 67 N. H. 89, 29 Atl. 671, in which the testator, after making provision for his wife, went on to provide that at her decease or marriage his estate should "descend and be distributed among nearest relations as follows;" thereupon giving various amounts to his brothers and sisters, half-brothers and half-sisters, and to a sister-in-law; and further provided that, if the estate should amount to more than the legacies given, "the surplus shall be equally divided among my nearest relations . . . share and share alike." It was held that the will plainly expressed an intention of the testator that the surplus should be divided among all the persons to whom the legacies were given; the court saying: "There is nothing indicating that the testator used the words 'nearest relations,' in the clause disposing of the surplus, as embracing different persons from those named by him as nearest relations in the preceding clause in making the bequests. The persons there intended by the words 'nearest relations' are specifically named. Having designated who were his nearest relations, it is not to be assumed that the testator used the phrase with a different intention in the next clause of the will."

The learned counsel for the appellant very properly concedes that parol evidence was not competent to explain the will or show the intention of the testator. The will is sufficiently definite, and speaks for itself. It may be, as claimed by the appellant's counsel, that the testator intended that his half-brother should receive the share of a brother of the whole blood, but he has not so clearly manifested such intention as to warrant the court in declaring it.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree of the court below is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,
v.
KRAFT.

(— C. C. A. —, 161 Fed. 300.)

Street railway — collision with obstruction — negligence.

That a person chose to board a street car after it was in motion, and was therefore on the running board looking for a seat when the car reached an obstruction near the track, which was in plain view, when he might have boarded the car before it started and gained a seat inside the car, or might have stopped the car and gained one, was not negligence as matter of law, so as to preclude his holding the person responsible for the obstruction liable for the injury resulting from collision therewith; but the question of his negligence was for the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to duty of street car company to a passenger on running board, see case note to Gregory v. Elmira Water, Light, & R. Co. 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 160.

Argued before Dallas, Gray, and Buffington, Circuit Judges.

Mr. J. J. Woodward for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John M. Gorman for defendant in error.

Dallas, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the defendant in error, hereinafter called the plaintiff, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him, which he alleged were caused by negligence of the plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the defendant; and the latter concedes that "the sole question before this court is whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which precluded recovery."

During the afternoon of June 4, 1906, the plaintiff boarded a moving street car, which had just left the beginning of its route at the corner of Broad and South Wyoming streets, in the city of Hazleton. It was an open car, with cross seats and a running board on the side. It was somewhat crowded, but the plaintiff believed he could get a seat inside, and intended and attempted to do so, although he was still wholly or partly on the running board, when, after the car had gone about 127 feet, a point opposite to the place of business of the defendant was reached. There one of its express wagons, with horse attached, was standing between the track and the curb, and the shaft of this wagon struck the plaintiff, threw him from the car, and seriously hurt him. It is probable that the projection of the shaft over the running board of the car resulted from some immediate movement of the horse; but whether it did or did not is unimportant, for in either case it might have been prevented by due care in placing the wagon and securing the horse, and the plaintiff had a right to assume that such care had been taken.

The learned judge dealt with the subject of contributory negligence in a manner quite as favorable to the defendant as it had any right to expect. He told the jury that "everyone is called upon to exercise the best judgment he can, by using his eyes and his senses, to keep out of danger;" and this he said with express reference to the claim of the defendant that "the plaintiff could see the obstruction in the street there, that it was in plain view when he was getting on the car, . . . while the car was moving, and that he ought to have noticed it and avoided putting himself in that way in a place of danger." And he added: "If this accident really is the fault of the plaintiff, because he put himself in a place of danger, he cannot recover; but, if he exercised the care that anyone would, any person of judgment,—all the care that could reasonably be expected of him,—and the defendant is found to have been negligent, then a complete case would be made out here, which would entitle him to a verdict.”

And this statement, in substance, was reiterated in answering the points submitted by counsel, as, for instance, in saying: “You must find that the defendant was negligent. If you at the same time find that the plaintiff was negligent, also, your verdict would be for the defendant. You have got to find both those points in favor of the plaintiff before he is entitled to your verdict.”

Thus the question of contributory negligence was clearly and correctly submitted to the jury, and we cannot assent to the proposition that the court erred in refusing to decide that, upon the defendant's hypothesis of fact, negligence per se on the part of the plaintiff had been shown. Assuming “that the plaintiff chose to board a moving car when he might have got a seat before it started, or have stopped the car and got a seat after it had started, and would then have been safe, and the obstacle which struck him while on the running board was in plain view,” yet it was for the jury to say whether these incidents, taken in connection with all the circumstances, did or did not constitute negligence in fact. They did not establish its existence as matter of law. It is true that, where contributory negligence of either class is so conclusively proven that a verdict for the plaintiff, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant. But the rule generally applicable, and which was rightly applied to this case, is that, as the question of negligence on the part of the defendant is one of fact for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances of the case and under proper instructions from the court, so, also, is the question of whether there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which was the proximate cause of the injury. Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 482, 27 L. ed. 1005, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 36 L. ed. 485, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679; Washington & G. R. Co. v. Harmon (Washington & G. R. Co. v. Tobriner) 147 U. S. 571, 37 L. ed. 284, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF UTAH, Respt.,
v.

J. E. BAYER et al., Appts.,

(— Utah, —, 97 Pac. 129.)

Commerce — license — validity.

1. A statute forbidding, without license, the canvassing for or selling by sample of goods made in another state, after they have been shipped into the state passing the statute, while permitting such canvassing for domestic goods, violates the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

License — discrimination.

2. A state cannot impose a tax on the right to sell to users and consumers by sample goods shipped into the state, and permit sales of such goods to merchants and persons not users and consumers without license.

Commerce — license — canvassers.

3. The state may make the license tax on the right to sell certain classes of goods by sample to consumers by canvassing from house to house apply to goods shipped from foreign states, when it applies equally to those of domestic origin.

License — inequality — validity.

4. A state statute imposing a heavy license tax upon the right to canvass from house to house for a certain limited number of articles not produced or manufactured within the state, and not injurious to health or morals, for the apparent purpose of favoring resident merchants with established places of business, violates the provisions of the Federal Constitution against abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and denying equal protection of the laws.

(August 14, 1908.)

Case Note. — License or occupation tax on hawkers and peddlers, and persons engaged in soliciting orders by sample or otherwise, as a violation of the commerce clause.

The decision in STATE v. BAYER that a statute requiring a license to be obtained to canvass for goods not of domestic manufacture after they have been shipped into the state, but permitting the canvassing for domestic goods without a license, is not constitutional, while in conformity with the long-established principle that any discrimination against goods because of their extra-state origin constitutes a burden upon interstate commerce, appears to be a novel application of such principle.

Historically viewed, the cases bearing upon the question stated present a number of series of decisions, each series involving some particular feature of the general question, usually culminating in a pronouncement of the United States Supreme Court, and tailing off into applications of the Su-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Davis County imposing a fine upon them for violating the statute requiring a license of persons canvassing for certain manufactured articles. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur C. Lyon, Van Cott, Allison, & Riter, and J. R. Haas, for appellants:

A state statute which prohibits by its express terms or by its necessary operation the taking of orders by nonresidents for lawful subjects of commerce in other states, or which imposes a license tax upon drummers or agents selling goods by sample or otherwise, or soliciting trade, or taking orders therefor, is a regulation of commerce, and is unconstitutional and invalid.

preme Court decision in various cases, whereby its principle becomes thoroughly incorporated into the body of our jurisprudence. The decisions herein set forth are arranged with reference to the various points that have come under discussion, rather than with reference to the particular occupation upon which it was sought to impose a license or tax; and decisions which have so clearly been rendered obsolete that their statement herein at length would be without present value will be merely referred to in passing for the purpose of characterizing them as such.

Discrimination against manufactures or products of other states.

The view that a state may constitutionally discriminate, in imposing license and occupation taxes, in favor of its own manufactures or products, which was adopted in Seymour v. State, 51 Ala. 52, on the ground that the state has power to encourage manufactures within its own borders, failed to meet with the approval of the United States Supreme Court.

The first case in that court involving the point was Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449, in which it was contended that a statute prohibiting the sale, within a certain district of the state, of goods other than agricultural products and articles manufactured in the state, by persons not residents in the state, without first obtaining a license, was repugnant to the commerce clause. The case, however, was decided upon the ground that the statute was repugnant to the constitutional provision that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; Mr. Justice Bradley filing a separate opinion in which he said that he thought such statute violated the commerce clause, and would do so although it imposed upon residents the same burden for selling goods by sample as is imposed on nonresidents, and therefore dissented from any expression in the opinion of the court which in any way implies that such a burden, whether in the shape of a tax or penalty, if made equally upon residents and nonresidents, would be constitutional.

The question was squarely met and disposed of in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, reversing 55 Mo. 288, in which it was held that a statute requiring the payment of a license tax by persons who deal in the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise which are not the growth, product, or manufacture of the state, by going from place to place to sell the same in the state, and requiring no such license tax from persons selling in a similar way goods which are the growth, product, or manufacture of the state, was in conflict with the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce.

And in Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565, reversing 33 Gratt. 898, it was held that a statute imposing a license tax on any person who shall sell, or offer for sale, the manufactured articles or machines of other states or territories, unless he is the owner thereof and taxed as a merchant, or take orders therefor, on commission or otherwise; and declaring that all persons other than resident manufacturers or their agents, selling articles manufactured in the state, shall pay a license tax, was held to amount to a regulation of interstate commerce; the court saying: "Here there is a clear discrimination in favor of home manufacturers, and against the manufacturers of other states. Sales by manufacturers are chiefly effected through agents. A tax upon their agents when thus engaged is, therefore, a tax upon them, and, if this is made to depend upon the foreign character of the articles, that is, upon their having been manufactured without the state, it is to that extent a regulation of commerce in the articles between the states. It matters not whether the tax be laid directly upon the articles sold or in the form of licenses for their sale. If, by reason of their foreign character, the state can impose a tax upon them, or upon the person through whom the sales are effected, the amount of the tax will be a matter resting in her discretion. She may place the tax at so high a figure as to exclude the introduction of the foreign article, and prevent competition with the home product. It was against legislation of this discriminating kind that the framers of the Constitution intended to guard, when they vested in Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states."

A state statute is unconstitutional and invalid which expressly gives a preference to goods manufactured within the state, or which makes a discrimination against non-residents, or against goods manufactured or grown outside the state.

In Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454, reversing 53 Mich. 264, 18 N. W. 807, it was held that a state law imposing a specific tax on persons engaged in the business of selling liquors at wholesale, or of soliciting or taking orders for such liquors to be shipped into the state, not having their principal place of business in the state, without imposing a like tax upon persons engaged in the like business in reference to liquors manufactured in the state, was unconstitutional as discriminating unfavorably against the citizens and products of other states, and therefore being a regulation of commerce.

In accordance with the doctrine enunciated in the foregoing decisions, the following statutes and ordinances have been held unconstitutional as violating the commerce clause:

In Re Watson, 15 Fed. 511, a Vermont statute requiring peddlers to obtain a license, and providing that no person should be deemed a peddler by reason of selling articles of goods, wares, or merchandise which are the manufacture of the state, except plated or gilded wares, jewelry, clocks, and watches.

In State v. McGinnis, 37 Ark. 362, a statute requiring peddlers engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise other than the growth, products, or manufactures of the state to obtain a license.

In Ex parte Thomas, 71 Cal. 204, 12 Pac. 53, an ordinance of a board of supervisors imposing a license tax upon every traveling merchant, hawker, or peddler who vends goods, wares, or merchandise of any kind other than manufactures or products of the state.

In Ames v. People, 25 Colo. 508, 55 Pac. 725, a statute requiring peddlers to obtain a license, but providing that such statute should not extend to persons who sell commodities manufactured or raised by themselves in the state.

In Rodgers v. McCoy, 6 Dak. 238, 44 N. W. 990, a statute requiring peddlers of merchandise not manufactured within the limits of the territory to pay a license tax, as tending to discriminate in the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured in other states and territories.

In Marshalltown v. Blum, 58 Iowa, 184, 43 Am. Rep. 116, 12 N. W. 266, an ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by any person whose business it is to sell at retail any goods, wares, or merchandise among or upon the public streets or grounds, or from house to house, but exempting from its operation persons retailing their own productions or goods of their own manufacture, if they reside in and the goods are manufactured in the county.

In State v. Furbush, 72 Me. 493, a statute allowing goods manufactured in the state to be peddled free, but exacting a license fee from those who peddle similar goods which are manufactured out of the state.

licensing of peddlers, discriminating between agricultural products of the United States and agricultural products of other countries, in reference to the requirement of a license to peddle them.

In Com. v. Simons, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 550, a statute and a municipal ordinance passed thereunder, forbidding the hawking or peddling, without a license, of any fish, fruit, or vegetables in any city of the first class, which provided that nothing contained in the act should prevent any citizen of the commonwealth from vending, hawking, or peddling the products of his farm or garden.

In State v. Pratt, 59 Vt. 590, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 299, 9 Atl. 556, a statute requiring a person going from town to town, or from place to place in the same town, carrying to sell or exposing for sale, goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth or manufacture of a foreign country, to obtain a license.

In Ex parte Rollins, 80 Va. 314, a statute imposing a privilege tax upon any person, other than a licensed merchant, who shall receive subscriptions for, or shall in any manner furnish, newspapers, books, maps, prints, pamphlets, or periodicals, printed or published beyond the limits of the state, was held unconstitutional as contravening the commerce clause, because discriminating in favor of publishers in the state, and in effect imposing a tax on publications of other states.

In Van Buren v. Downing, 41 Wis. 122, a statute requiring hawkers and peddlers to obtain a license was held unconstitutional as discriminating against articles manufactured in other states, in providing that nothing contained in it should be so construed as to prevent any manufacturer, mechanic, or nurseryman having a legal residence in the state from selling his own works or productions manufactured or grown in the state, in any manner, without a license. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In State v. Browning, 62 Mo. 591, the decision in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, as to the invalidity of the Missouri statute, was followed without discussion as a binding authority.

On the other hand, statutes imposing license and occupation taxes of the sort under discussion have been held in a number of cases to be free from any discrimination obnoxious to the commerce clause.

In Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, affirming 9 Baxt. 518, it was held that a state tax on peddlers of sewing machines, which applied alike to sewing machines manufactured in the state and out of it, was valid.

In Re Rudolph, 6 Sawy. 295, 2 Fed. 65, a statute providing that every traveling merchant, agent, drummer, or other person, selling or offering for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise of any kind to be delivered at some future time, or carrying samples, and selling, or offering to sell, merchandise of any kind similar to such samples, delivered at some future time, should obtain a license, was held not to be an unlawful regulation of commerce, there being no discrimination against the goods of other states in favor of the products of the state enacting the statute.

In Ex parte Hanson, 28 Fed. 127, an ordinance requiring drummers and commercial travelers to pay a license tax, which on its face made no discrimination between the products of the state and those of any other state or county, but required a license from all persons engaged in the business of going about from place to place within the city soliciting the purchase of goods, without any reference to the place of their production or manufacture, was held not to be a regulation of interstate commerce, although it may have had the effect to impose a tax upon the products of other states, or because nonresident concerns were more likely to make their sales in that manner than were residents.

Straup, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves the validity and construction of §§ 1710x and 1710x1 of title 61, Comp. Laws 1907, which are as follows:

"No person, firm, or corporation, as principal or agent, shall peddle out, hawk, or, after shipment to this state, canvass, by going from house to house or from place to place, and sell or offer for sale, by sample, to users or consumers, clocks, agricultural implements, tools or machinery, stoves or ranges, wagons, buggies, carriages, surreys, or other similar vehicles, washing machines, churns, pictures, enlarged pictures, or picture frames, lightning rods, spectacles, jewelry, sewing machines, books or musical instruments, within this state, without previously obtaining a license therefor, as herein provided.

In American Harrow Co. v. Shaffer, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 336, 68 Fed. 750, a Virginia statute imposing a license tax upon a person who sells, or offers for sale, manufactured implements or machines by retail, unless he is the owner thereof and duly licensed as a merchant, or takes orders therefor on commission or otherwise, was held not to create a regulation of interstate commerce,—distinguishing Webber v. Virginia, 103 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565, upon the ground that the statute therein involved fixed the license tax for the sale, by an agent, of manufactured articles of other states or territories at a rate different from that fixed for the sale of articles manufactured in the state.

In Carrollton v. Bazzette, 159 Ill. 284, 31 L.R.A. 522, 42 N. E. 837, it was held that an ordinance prohibiting the business of itinerant merchants to be carried on without a license is not invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce as applied to one who purchases bankrupt stocks wherever he can obtain them at the best advantage, and sometimes buys them in other states, when it makes no discrimination between merchants whose goods are imported into the state and those whose goods are manufactured or purchased in the state, and does not impose any burden on sales in original packages brought into the state.

In Territory v. Russell (N. M.) 86 Pac. 551, a statute forbidding, under penalty, the sale, by persons engaged in itinerant trade, by sample, or otherwise, at retail to individual purchasers who were not dealers in the articles sold, of all articles except maps, books, newspapers, fuel, fruits, and domestic machinery, unless the persons so selling shall obtain a peddler's license; but which made no distinction between articles produced in the territory and those produced elsewhere,—was held not to violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

In State v. Long, 95 N. C. 582, 59 Am. Rep. 263, a statute imposing a license tax on drummers was held not to conflict with the Federal Constitution, although dealers paying a drummer's tax were allowed a rebate of that amount on their purchase tax; such a provision for a rebate neither in form nor in practical operation amounting to a discrimination against merchants residing out of the state and sending their traveling agents into the state.

In Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C. 328, 24 S. E. 352, a privilege tax imposed on peddlers was held to be constitutional with respect to the agent of a foreign corporation, where the statute made no discrimination in favor of citizens of the state.

Validity as an exercise of the police power.

While the validity of the various statutes and ordinances as an exercise of the police power is an element present in nearly every decision upon the general question here under consideration, the following cases tend especially to show the extent to which the police power may be relied upon to sustain the requirement of a license; but, for instances in which the police power has been held not to warrant statutory requirements, reference must be made to the other cases throughout this note.

So far as a general rule may be stated, it is that a statute requiring a license to be obtained by persons engaged in itinerant trade, where performing the legitimate office of a police regulation, will be valid, though it may incidentally affect interstate commerce.

In State v. Wheelock, 95 Iowa, 577, 30 L.R.A. 429, 58 Am. St. Rep. 442, 64 N. W. 620, it was held that a reasonable license fee

"No person, firm, or corporation, as principal or agent, shall engage in or conduct, as an itinerant vender, peddler, hawker, or traveling merchant, the business of peddling, selling, or bartering, or, after shipment to this state, canvassing or selling by sample, clocks, agricultural implements, tools or machinery, stoves or ranges, wagons, buggies, carriages, surreys, or other similar vehicles, washing machines, or churns, pictures, enlarged pictures, or picture frames, sewing machines, books, lightning rods, spectacles, jewelry, or musical instruments, within this state, without previously obtaining a license therefor, as herein provided."

In the complaint filed against the appellants it is alleged that they, "after shipment into the state of Utah of certain buggies and carriages, did then and there unlawfully and wilfully engage in and conduct, as itinerant venders, peddlers, hawkers, and traveling merchants, the business of peddling, selling, bartering, canvassing, and selling the same, by sample, without previously obtaining a license therefor." The cause was submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts, which, in substance, is: That the Spaulding Manufacturing Company, a copartnership, is engaged in the business of manufacturing wagons and carriages at Grinnell, in the state of Iowa. That all the members of the copartnership are citizens and residents of that state. The appellants Bayer and Bacon are residents and citizens of Iowa, and appellants Stayner and Eckhart are citizens and residents of Utah.

charged upon itinerant venders of drugs or articles intended for the treatment of diseases who publicly profess to cure or treat disease is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce, although the medicines sold are in original packages brought from another state; but that the requirement of such a license is a reasonable exercise of the police power.

In West v. Mt. Sterling, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1670, 65 S. W. 120, it was held that a municipal ordinance imposing upon peddlers and itinerant retailers of goods a license tax of $15 per day was not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce, being essentially a police regulation.

In Com. v. Newhall, 164 Mass. 338, 41 N. E. 647, a statute requiring itinerant venders to obtain a license was held constitutional, even as applied to persons in the employ of a foreign company and engaged in the sale of imported goods in the original packages, where purporting to be passed under the police power of the commonwealth, for the purpose of preventing and punishing fraud in sales by itinerant venders; and an examination of the statutes showed that such was its real design, and that the provisions for state and local licenses are merely incidental means of compensating the state and the localities in which the itinerant venders ply their business, for the expenses of necessary state and local supervision.

In State v. Smithson, 106 Mo. 149, 17 S. W. 221, it was held that a statute requiring persons dealing in the selling of patents and patent rights, patent or other medicines, lightning rods, goods, wares, or merchandise, except books, charts, maps, and stationery, by going from place to place, to sell the same, to take out a license, was open to no constitutional objections.

In Kolb v. Boonton, 64 N. J. L. 163, 44 Atl. 873, a town ordinance requiring hawkers, peddlers, and itinerant venders of merchandise to obtain a license was held valid, even though incidentally affecting interstate commerce.

In Wynne v. Wright, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 19, it was held that a license tax 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

imposed on peddlers of jewelry was not unconstitutional, although it may have been imported from another state.

In Com. v. Gardner, 133 Pa. 284, 7 L.R.A. 666, 19 Am. St. Rep. 645, 19 Atl. 550, it was held that a state statute prohibiting the sale of goods by hawkers or peddlers is not void as a regulation of commerce, where there is no discrimination against nonresidents, or goods from out of the state.

In Com. v. Dunham, 191 Pa. 73, 43 Atl. 84, it was held that the act of April 17, 1846 (P. L. 364), relating to hawking and peddling, being a proper exercise of the police power, was not unconstitutional as interfering with interstate commerce.

In Morrill v. State, 38 Wis. 428, 20 Am. Rep. 12, a statute making it a penal offense for any person to travel from place to place for the purpose of carrying to sell, or exposing to sale, any goods, wares, and merchandise, unless such a person has a license as a hawker and peddler, was held to be a mere police regulation, and not a regulation of commerce, as it does not restrict nonresidents from selling their wares in the state at fixed places of business. The case was, however, reversed in 154 U. S. 626, Appx. 23 L. ed. 1009, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1206, upon the authority of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, on account of a provision of the statute that nothing contained in it should be so construed as to prevent any manufacturer, mechanic, or nurseryman, having a legal residence in the state, from selling his works or productions manufactured or grown in the state, in any manner, without a license.

But in Sayre v. Phillips, 148 Pa. 482, 16 L.R.A. 49, 33 Am. St. Rep. 842, 24 Atl. 76, it was held that a borough ordinance which discriminates against nonresidents by prohibiting all persons from peddling or selling goods from house to house without a license, which is fixed at so high a figure that it amounts to prohibition, but which excepts residents of the borough from its provisions, is not within the police power, and is void.

That the appellants were employed by the Spaulding Manufacturing Company as salesmen. "That said defendants, while so employed as salesmen by said company and in the discharge of their duty, after shipment into this state of a car load of carriages and buggies, engaged in the pursuit or business of canvassing and selling by sample and otherwise certain buggies or carriages to people residing in the county of Davis and state of Utah. That said defendants canvassed the towns of Farmington and Centerville, in said county, with samples, and exhibited on or about November 15, 1907, samples of buggies and carriages to Charles O. Rollings, and sold to him a certain carriage, and agreed to deliver a carriage similar in all respects to the sample thus exhibited to the said purchaser within thirty days thereafter, and thereafter, within such stipulated time, did deliver a carriage similar to the sample aforesaid, and during the times mentioned in said complaint the procedure aforesaid was repeated. That said defendants during the times mentioned in said complaint, and in said Davis county, trailed vehicles through said Davis county, in some instances selling and thereupon delivering such trailed vehicles, and in some instances said trailed vehicles were sold and there was taken in exchange other vehicles, which were trailed for a distance and then again sold. all of the aforesaid matters occurring in said Davis county and during the times mentioned in said complaint. Validity as an exercise of the taxing power.

It may likewise be stated, in connection with this point, that cases involving it may be found throughout the note, those here segregated being only those in which special prominence was given to it.

In Ex parte Robinson, 12 Nev. 263, 28 Am. Rep. 794, a statute imposing a tax upon drummers and traveling merchants who go from place to place soliciting orders was held to be a revenue law, and not in contravention of the commerce clause, the provisions of the act being general in their character and applying as well to citizens of the state as to citizens of other states, and to the fruits and agricultural products of other states as well as of the state enacting the statute; the court saying: "To pronounce such a law unconstitutional because it might in some imaginable manner affect the operation of commerce would be to surrender the principle that a state has the right, for its support, to impose a tax upon citizens who are conducting business within its jurisdiction." In view of later decisions of the United States Supreme Court, this case appears to be of doubtful authority.

In Speer v. Com. 23 Gratt. 935, 14 Am. Rep. 164, it was held that a statute requiring persons to obtain a license in order to sell, or offer to sell, by sample, being purely a revenue law, and not designed to regulate commerce, was not in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. The comment made upon the foregoing case is also here applicable.

But in Com. ex rel. Overfield v. Walker, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 586, it was held that a borough license tax imposed for revenue purposes only, upon hawkers and peddlers, could not constitutionally be applied to one making sales for a firm in another state, whose business was not of such a character as to be subject to police regulation. It does not appear from the report of the case whether the sales were of goods to be imported into the state, but, unless such was the fact, the court would appear to have misconceived the case of Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719, upon which the decision purports to be based.

Interstate character of transaction generally.

By far the greater number of decisions upon the subject annotated turn upon the point whether the transaction to which the statute or ordinance is sought to be applied is within the protection of the commerce clause. These decisions are herein grouped, so far as possible, with reference to the nature of the transaction in question.

In Sears v. Warren County, 36 Ind. 267, 10 Am. Rep. 62, it was held that a statute requiring traveling merchants and peddlers not residents of the state to obtain a license to vend foreign merchandise was not repugnant to the commerce clause, upon the ground that it related to internal and domestic rather than interstate commerce. But this view seems now to have been discarded. See cases under title, "Discrimination against manufactures or products of other states," supra.

In Re Lipschitz, 14 N. D. 622, 95 N. W. 157, it was held that a statute providing that "it shall be unlawful for any person to travel from place to place in any county of this state for the purpose of carrying to sell, or exposing or offering to sell, barter, or exchange any goods, wares, merchandise, or any other property whatever, without first obtaining a license therefor," was not open to objection as placing a tax or burden upon interstate commerce; but that it relates entirely to commerce within the state. The difference between this act, which does not include persons soliciting sales of goods by sample for future delivery, and the act held unconstitutional in State ex rel. Selliger v. O'Connor, 5 N. D. 629, 67 N. W. 824, was pointed out.

In Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493, it was held that a statute requiring "every hawker, peddler, or petty chapman, or other person, going from town to town, or from place to place, or from dwelling house to dwelling house, in the same town, either on foot, or manufactured by said company at its factory in Grinnell, state of Iowa, with the exceptions aforesaid, and the vehicles so sold and delivered belonged to and were the property of said company, and were sold for and on its behalf, and the said vehicles so manufactured in Grinnell, Iowa, were sent from there to Davis county, Utah, for the purpose of being sold, and for no other purpose. That such vehicles were not out of the possession of said company or its agents from the time of their receipt within the state of Utah until the same were sold and delivered as aforesaid." Upon such facts, the defendants were found guilty and adjudged to pay a fine.

On appeal they urge that the enactment contravenes § 8, art. 1, U. S. Const. relating with one or more horses, or otherwise carrying for sale or exposing to sale, any goods," to obtain a license, was not unconstitutional, being applicable wholly to internal commerce.

See also, in this connection, Carrollton v. Bazzette, 159 Ill. 284, 31 L.R.A. 522, 42 N. E. 837, supra, under the heading "Discrimination against manufactures or products of other states;" and also cases under the specific heads following.

Solicitation of orders, by sample or otherwise, as interstate commerce.

Although there are earlier cases in which statutes providing for an occupation tax upon persons engaged in soliciting orders for goods to be delivered at a future time were held to be constitutional as applied to persons engaged in obtaining orders for goods to be shipped from another state (Ex parte Thornton, 4 Hughes, 220, 12 Fed. 538; Territory v. Farnsworth, 5 Mont. 303, 5 Pac. 869), it is now thoroughly settled that a statute or ordinance which is not indubitably an exercise of the police power, and which in its operation imposes a burden upon the negotiation of sales of goods to be imported from another state, is obnoxious to the commerce clause.

To this general rule there is an exception, created by the Wilson act, in the case of intoxicating liquors. See Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 51 L. ed. 724, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 733, infra.

It is held to make no difference in the interstate character of the sale, that the goods are delivered through an agent or shipped in bulk to him for delivery, where the transaction to which the statute or ordinance relates is in fact between a vendor in one state and a purchaser in another.

In Robbins v. Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, reversing 13 Lea, 303, it was held that a statute imposing a privilege tax upon all drummers and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district, offering for sale, or selling, goods, wares, or merchandise therein, by sample, was unconstitutional, the negotiation of sales of goods which are in another state, for the purpose of introducing them into the state in which the negotiation is made, being interstate commerce, and not subject to state taxation, even though there is no discrimination between it and domestic commerce.

In Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, reversing 23 Tex. App. 662, 50 Am. Rep. 783, 5 S. W. 91, it was held that the law of Texas requiring every commercial traveler or drummer, salesman or solicitor of trade, by sample or otherwise, to obtain a license and to pay a tax therefor, was, when applied to citizens of other states soliciting trade in Texas, void as contravening the commerce clause.

In Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 32 L. ed. 637, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 256, affirming 5 Mackey, 489, a statute imposing a license on persons whose business it is, as agents, to offer for sale goods, wares, and merchandise by sample, catalogue, or otherwise, was held to constitute a regulation of interstate commerce so far as applicable to persons soliciting the sale of goods on behalf of individuals or firms doing business outside the District of Columbia.

In Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 38 L. ed. 719, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 658, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829, reversing 143 Pa. 642, 14 L.R.A. 100, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 735, 24 Am. St. Rep. 580, 22 Atl. 893, an ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by all persons canvassing or soliciting, within the city, orders for goods, books, paintings, wares, or merchandise of any kind, or persons delivering such articles under orders so obtained or solicited; but providing that it should not apply to persons selling by sample to manufacturers or licensed merchants or dealers residing and doing business in the city,—was held to be clearly not a mere police regulation, simply inconveniencing one engaged in interstate commerce, and so only indirectly affecting the business, but a direct charge and burden upon that business. The court said: "It is manufactured or produced without the state, or otherwise interferes with interstate commerce, it is unconstitutional. It is well established that a tax upon the seller of goods is a tax upon the goods themselves. It is also well settled that state laws laying occupation, business, and privilege taxes contravene the Federal Constitution in so far as they impose a tax on persons engaged in taking orders for goods by sample or otherwise to be filled from stocks not within the state at the time the sales are made. It is equally well settled that, where the goods are shipped into the state and stored in advance of the sales, and the orders taken are filled therefrom, the business is not interstate but local commerce; and therefore the business of agents soliciting orders for such goods is not protected by the provisions of the Federal Constitution where the agents are in possession of the goods at the time the sales are made, and not only solicit the orders, but complete the sales by delivering at one and the same time. In notes to the case of Re Kinyon, reported in 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. pages 701-703, may be found a citation and collection of nearly all the cases bearing upon the question. To what extent these statements need modification or are applicable, when the goods offered for sale in such manner are in original packages in which they were imported, need not now be considered.

The act in question makes it unlawful, without first obtaining a license, to peddle or hawk the goods enumerated in the stat-true, in the present case, the tax is imposed only for selling to persons other than manufacturers and licensed merchants; but, if the state can tax for the privilege of selling to one class, it can for selling to another, or to all. In either case it is a restriction on the right to sell, and a burden on lawful commerce between the citizens of two states. It is as much a burden upon commerce to tax for the privilege of selling to a minister as it is for that of selling to a merchant. It is true, also, that the tax imposed is for selling in a particular manner, but a regulation as to the manner of sale, whether by sample or not, whether by exhibiting samples at a store or at a dwelling house, is surely a regulation of commerce. It must be borne in mind that the goods which the defendant was engaged in selling, to wit, pictures and picture frames, are open to no condemnation, and are unchallenged subjects of commerce. There is no charge of dealing in obscene or indecent pictures, or that the pictures, or the frames, were in any manner dangerous to the health, morals, or general welfare of the community. It must also be borne in mind that the ordinance is not one designed to protect from imposition and wrong either minors, habitual drunkards, or persons under any other affliction or disability. There is no discrimination except between manufacturers and licensed merchants on the one hand, and the rest of the community on the other, and, unless it be a matter of just police regulation to tax for the privilege of selling to manufacturers and merchants, it cannot be to tax for the privilege of selling to the rest of the community. The same observation may also be made in respect to the places and manner in which the sales were charged to have been made. It is as much within the scope of the police power to restrain parties from going to a store or manufactory as from going to a dwelling house for the purposes of making a sale. We do not mean to say that none of these matters to which we have referred are within the reach of the police power; but simply that the conditions on the one side are no more within its reach than those on the other, so 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that if, under the excuse of an exercise of the police power, this ordinance can be sustained, and sales in the manner therein named be restricted, by an equally legitimate exercise of that power, almost any sale could be prevented."

In Ex parte Stockton, 33 Fed. 95, a Texas statute requiring every commercial traveler soliciting trade by sample or otherwise to pay an annual occupation tax was held to be an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce as applied to the citizens of another state having no goods in the state, but selling by sample.

In Re Kimmel, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 114, 41 Fed. 775, a municipal ordinance requiring all persons engaged in going from house to house and selling, or taking orders for, any merchandise not of their own manufacture, to take out a license, was held to be repugnant to the commerce clause, as applied to an agent engaged in selling goods to be shipped into the state from another state.

In Re Houston, 14 L.R.A. 719, 47 Fed. 539, it was said that the mere solicitation of orders to be filled from another state is within the protection of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

In Re Flinn, 57 Fed. 496, it was said that, if a state statute was susceptible of construction as authorizing legal process to be issued for the collection of a penalty for the nonpayment of taxes on sales by sample of goods not then within the state, then the act was a regulation of interstate commerce.

In Re Mitchell, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 767, 62 Fed. 576, a Wisconsin statute imposing a license tax upon persons traveling from place to place for the sale of goods, "at retail or to consumers," by sample or otherwise, was held unlawfully to interfere with interstate commerce when attempted to be enforced against agents soliciting orders by sample, for goods, on behalf of a resident of another state and to be delivered therefrom, and which were legitimate and proper articles of commerce.

In Ex parte Hough, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 327, 69 Fed. 330, a North Carolina statute imposing a license tax upon every person, ute, or to engage in or conduct as an itinerant vender, peddler, hawker, or traveling merchant the business of peddling, selling, or bartering any such goods. This part of the act applies to all persons, regardless of their residence, and to all of the enumerated articles, whether manufactured or produced within or without the state. To this extent the act does not appear to make any discrimination adversely to persons or property of other states, and does not, for that reason, affect or interfere with interstate commerce. The act further provides that, after shipment to this state, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining a license, to canvass by going from house to house or from place to place, and sell or offer for sale by sample to users or consumers any of the enumerated articles, or to engage in or conduct, after shipment to this state, the business of canvassing or selling by sample any such goods. That is to say, after any of the enumerated articles are shipped into the state, it shall not be lawful, without first obtaining a license, to canvass or sell by sample any of them, though they have not yet been mingled with, nor become a part of, the common mass of property within the state, nor otherwise lost their character as articles of interstate commerce. The mere fact that they may have been shipped into the state is not alone conclusive that they have lost such character, for, as said by Mr. Justice Field in the case of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347: "The commercial power continues until the company, or manufacturer who shall engage in the business of selling pianos or organs by sample, list, or otherwise, in the state, was held unconstitutional as a regulation of interstate commerce, as applied to the selling by sample for a manufacturer and dealer located in another state.

In Hofschulte v. Doe, 78 Fed. 436, it was said that a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon every person, firm, or corporation who solicits orders for and sells to the inhabitants of the town, at retail, any books, goods, wares, or merchandise to be delivered by [to?] those who may purchase from said person, firm, or corporation, at a time subsequent to the taking of said order, was invalid as being in contravention of the commerce clause.

In Re Tinsman, 95 Fed. 648, a municipal ordinance requiring persons engaged in the hawking, peddling, itinerant vending, or soliciting the sale or purchase of books, maps, or pictures, to take out a license and pay a tax, was held unconstitutional when enforced against a person or firm soliciting orders for a manufacturer of goods in another state, being an exercise, not of the police power, but of the taxing power.

In Cottam v. Oregon City, 98 Fed. 570, it was said that a municipal ordinance requiring all persons selling goods, or soliciting the sale of goods, to pay a license tax therefor, so far as it applies to persons soliciting the sale of goods in behalf of those doing business in another state, is a regulation of interstate commerce and void; but that such ordinance is not void if the solicitor carries his goods with him and thereby becomes a peddler, and so comes within reach of the general or police power of the state.

In Ex parte Green, 114 Fed. 959, a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax on "each itinerant person or peddler traveling from residence to residence soliciting orders for, or selling directly or indirectly, goods, wares, or merchandise to the consumer," was held unconstitutional where applied to one engaged in soliciting orders on behalf of a principal in another state, who, after accepting them, shipped from such other state merchandise direct to the purchaser, the ordinance not being one which involves the mere exercise of the police power for the protection of the morals or health of the community, but a direct tax upon interstate commerce itself.

In State v. Agee, 83 Ala. 110, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 21, 3 So. 856, a statute imposing a license tax on itinerant peddlers of fruit trees, vines, shrubs, etc., was held, as applied to one selling by sample goods on behalf of an employer in another state, to be unconstitutional as interfering with interstate commerce.

In State ex rel. Sellinger v. O'Connor, 5 N. D. 629, 67 N. W. 824, a statute providing: "It shall be unlawful for any person to travel from place to place in any county within this state for the purpose of carrying to sell or exposing or offering for sale, barter, or exchange at retail, any goods, wares, merchandise, notions, or other articles of trade whatsoever, except as hereinafter provided, whether by sample or otherwise, and whether such goods, wares, merchandise, notions or other articles of trade whatsoever are delivered at the time of sale, or to be delivered at some future time, unless such person shall have first obtained a license as a peddler as hereinafter provided,"—was held to be, so far as it assumes to tax those who sell by sample goods to be shipped in from another state and thereafter delivered, an unlawful interference with the exclusive authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce; and the unconstitutional portion of the act was held to be so inseparably interwoven with its other provisions as to render it wholly inoperative.

In State v. Rankin, 11 S. D. 144, 76 N. W. 299, a statute imposing a license tax upon each peddler or solicitor taking orders for groceries, cloth, hardware, or other mercantile establishments was held to be unconstitutional as applied to persons soliciting orders for a concern in another state, as imposing a burden upon interstate commerce.

modity has ceased to be the subject of discriminating legislation by reason of its foreign character. That power protects it, even after it has entered the state, from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin." The effect of the legislation is to forbid, without license, the canvassing or selling by sample any of the goods specified in the statute and which have been shipped into this state, and permits, without license, canvassing and selling in such manner the same kind of goods manufactured or produced within the state. "A law," says Mr. Justice Swayne, in the case of Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, "which requires a license to be taken out by peddlers who sell articles not produced in the state, and requires no such license with respect to those who sell in the same way articles which are produced in the state, is in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." That portion of the act which requires a license to canvass or sell by sample goods shipped into the state, and permits, without a license, the canvassing or selling in such manner goods not shipped into the state, violates the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and is therefore void. Such a conclusion was also reached by the supreme court of Washington in the case of Bacon v. Locke, 42 Wash. 215, 83 Pac. 721, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 589, upon a similar statute.

This portion of the statute is further an illegal regulation of commerce, in that it

Rep. 146, 11 S. E. 233, it was held that one going from place to place with a sample stove, soliciting orders therefor, which were filled by shipment from another state, was protected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution against a state statute requiring a license to peddle.

In accordance with the foregoing decision, it was held in McClelland v. Marietta, 96 Ga. 749, 22 S. E. 329, that a city ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by persons soliciting orders within the corporate limits was unconstitutional as applied to a solicitor of orders on behalf of a nonresident corporation, which were filled from the home office.

In Re Kinyon, 9 Idaho, 642, 75 Pac. 268, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 699, it was held that a statute providing for the licensing of peddlers, hawkers, and solicitors taking orders for goods is unconstitutional and an unwarranted interference with interstate commerce in so far as it attempts to impose such a burden upon the authorized solicitors and agents of citizens of other states trying to introduce and sell their goods in the state; but that a distinction might be made where the goods or property, at the time of the sale, are within the state and under the control of the agent or solicitor.

In Bloomington v. Bourland, 137 Ill. 534, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 667, 13 Am. St. Rep. 382, 27 N. E. 692, a municipal charter authorizing, and an ordinance imposing, a license tax upon hawkers, peddlers, and canvassers, was held, so far as operative upon persons soliciting orders for goods for a principal in another state, to violate the interstate commerce clause.

In Martin v. Rosedale, 130 Ind. 109, 29 N. E. 410, an ordinance making it unlawful for any traveling peddler to ply his avocation within the corporate limits of the town without first procuring a license was held, when applied to merchandise not in the state, owned by citizens of another state and sold in the state by sample, to be an interference with interstate commerce.

In Simmons Hardware Co. v. McGuire, 39 La. Ann. 848, 2 So. 592, it was held that a statute requiring that "all traveling agents offering any species of merchandise in this state for sale, or selling the same by sample, or otherwise, shall pay . . . a license of $50," was repugnant to the commerce clause, the negotiation of sales of goods which are in another state being interstate commerce.

In People v. Bunker, 128 Mich. 160, 87 N. W. 90, a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee on persons going about from place to place carrying with them any goods, wares, supplies, or property, or samples of the same, and selling or offering for sale the same, either by sample or otherwise, was held to be an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce as applied to one soliciting orders for goods to be shipped into the state by a nonresident manufacturer.

In Ex parte Rosenblatt, 19 Nev. 439, 3 Am. St. Rep. 901, 14 Pac. 298, a statute providing for the licensing of traveling merchants, and merchants doing business through soliciting agents commonly known as drummers, was held unconstitutional, for repugnancy to the commerce clause, as applied to one engaged in soliciting orders for goods to be delivered at a future time, from another state, by his principals, residents of that state.

In State v. Bracco, 103 N. C. 349, 9 S. E. 404, a statute requiring drummers to obtain a license was held unconstitutional, in so far as it applies to nonresident drummers and all persons nonresident selling goods, wares, and merchandise by wholesale, or by sample in the state.

In Port Clinton v. Shafer, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 583, it was held that an ordinance requiring all peddlers and persons canvassing from house to house for the purpose of selling goods, to take out a license, was not rendered unobjectionable, as not imposing a restraint on interstate commerce, by the proviso that the ordinance should not be applicable to persons soliciting orders for the manufacture of goods manufactured beyond the boundaries of the state; the proviso not being wide enough in its scope to include all articles of interstate commerce.

not even injurious to health or morals of the community—and required an annual fee or tax of $500 to be paid to peddle any of them, while the business of peddling and hawking of all other goods and articles, including those which are injurious to health and morals, and which affect the security of the lives, limbs, and comfort of the people, may be carried on with perfect freedom and without license. That is to say, under the act one may peddle shotguns and bowie knives, dynamite, and gunpowder, celery compound and cocaine, tobacco and opium, and many other things (whether harmful or harmless) without license and with impunity; but to peddle the Holy Bible or any other book, wagons, buggies, stoves, sewing machines, and a few other articles enumerated in the statute an annual fee or tax of $500 is exacted. Now, it is apparent that, under the pretense of exercising a police power, or of adopting a revenue measure, the legislature passed the act for the mere benefit of local and domestic dealers. Of a similar act passed by the legislature of the state of Washington, the Federal court, in the case of Spaulding v. Evenson (C. C.) 149 Fed. 913, said: "In 1903 an act was passed by the legislature of this state . . . which undertook to prohibit the sale of vehicles, stoves, ranges, pianos, or other merchandise without a license, and the license fee was fixed at $10 per day, but with the proviso that the act should not apply to any person selling any of said articles from his regularly maintained stock or estab-there would be no doubt that they would then have been included in the general mass of the property of the state, subject to taxation.

In Overton v. Vicksburg, 70 Miss. 558, 13 So. 226, a city ordinance requiring all transient peddlers to pay a privilege tax and to procure a license was held unconstitutional, so far as it is applied to an agent selling goods by sample for a principal in another state, who, upon receipt of the order, ships the goods to the agent for delivery to the purchaser, from whom the agent collects the first instalment of the purchase money, which is applied as a part of his commission for making the sale.

In Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Campen, 135 N. C. 506, 47 S. E. 658, it was held that the exaction of a license tax imposed on every itinerant person peddling ranges, as a prerequisite to the exercise by a nonresident corporation of the right to sell its ranges in the state, was a violation of the commerce clause, where the sales were made by sample and the goods were manufactured in another state, shipped into the state, and delivered by the seller's agent in the original package.

In Hurford v. State, 91 Tenn. 669, 20 S. W. 201, a statute imposing a privilege tax upon the occupation of "sample sellers and solicitors" was held to be an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce so far as applied to nonresidents engaged in taking orders for goods to be shipped to the buyer from a nonresident principal, whether such goods were shipped by mail, registered letter, or by express, or delivered by the agent in person.

In State ex rel. South Bend v. Glasby, 50 Wash. 598, 97 Pac. 734, a municipal ordinance requiring a license fee to be paid by every person canvassing or taking orders for pictures, clothes, clothing, groceries, or any other merchandise, either for immediate or future delivery, was held invalid, as a regulation of interstate commerce, as to a traveling agent and solicitor for orders for groceries, which he transmits to his principals in another state, who are at liberty to accept and fill only such orders as they choose, whereupon the goods are shipped and delivered to the respective parties in unbroken packages by persons other than the traveling agents and solicitors securing the orders.

In Chicago Portrait Co. v. Macon, 147 Fed. 967, a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon "peddlers or hawkers, meaning those who sell any article of merchandise, books, etc., or from house to house solicit orders therefor, whether sold direct or delivered at a later period," was held unlawfully to interfere with interstate commerce where enforced against the agents of a nonresident corporation engaged in delivering completed pictures for which orders had been taken, sent to them for that purpose only.

In Ex parte Hull, 153 Fed. 459, a statute imposing a license tax upon each person, firm, or corporation soliciting orders for the enlargement of photographs of any character, or for picture frames, was held invalid as applied to an agent of a foreign corporation who delivered pictures in frames, and collected the money due, on orders previously taken by another agent and sent to the corporation outside the state to be filled.

—as affected by shipment in bulk to agent.

In Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229, an ordinance requiring a license fee from persons engaged in selling or delivering picture frames or pictures was held invalid as an attempt to interfere with and regulate interstate commerce, as applied to an agent of a nonresident portrait company, who received from such company pictures and frames manufactured by it to fill orders previously obtained, and, after breaking bulk and placing each picture in the frame designed for it, delivered them to the respective purchasers. The court said: "The selection of the frame was as much a part of the purchase and sale as the selection of the picture. Nor does the fact that these articles were not shipped separately and directly to each individual purchaser, but were sent to an agent of the vender at lished place of business, when such stock had been maintained in the county for a period of six months. This act was several times held discriminative and void by superior judges of the state of well-recognized ability, but did not apparently reach the supreme court; those decisions being generally acquiesced in. While it has been suggested by affidavit that complainants are carrying on business in violation of this law, it was not referred to in argument, and it may be assumed that counsel do not rely upon that point. In 1905 an act was passed to meet the objections to that of 1903.

. . . It provides that every person, firm, or corporation who peddles out after shipment to the state, canvasses, or sells by sample, etc., shall pay in advance an annual license tax of $200. This act was recently declared void by the state supreme court. [Bacon v. Locke, 42 Wash. 215, 83 Pac. 721, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 589.] It is a matter of common notoriety that this legislation was enacted at the suggestion and for the benefit of local dealers. The amount fixed for license by the legislature was intended to be prohibitive of competition by peddlers. Shortly after the decision holding the act of 1905 unconstitutional, we find the dealers who had attempted to put the peddlers out of business by legislation resorting to the very ingenious scheme which has been here disclosed. It is proposed now to accomplish by subterfuge that which the courts of the state have repeatedly held cannot be done directly." In the case of Robbins v.

Greensboro, who delivered them to the purchasers, deprive the transaction of its character as interstate commerce. It was only that the vender used two instead of one agency in the delivery. It would seem evident that, if the vender had sent the articles by an express company, which should collect on delivery, such a mode of delivery would not have subjected the transaction to state taxation. The same could be said if the vender himself, or by a personal agent, had carried and delivered the goods to the purchaser. That the articles were sent as freight by rail, and were received at the railroad station by an agent who delivered them to the respective purchasers, in no wise changes the character of the commerce as interstate."

In Racine Iron Co. v. McCommons, 111 Ga. 536, 51 L.R.A. 134, 36 S. E. 866, it was held that the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution does not operate to prevent a state from imposing, for the purpose of raising revenue, a license tax under a statute providing for such a tax "upon each peddler of clocks or smoothing irons," upon persons who, as traveling agents for principals residing in other states, make executory contracts for the sale of goods; and who, when the same are shipped into the state imposing the tax, receive them in bulk, break the original packages in which they are contained, and distribute them among the customers with whom such contracts have been made.

The doctrine of the foregoing case was, however, overthrown by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Caldwell v. North Carolina, supra; and it was accordingly held in Stone v. State, 117 Ga. 292, 43 S. E. 740, that a statute making it a misdemeanor for any peddler or itinerant trader, except such as are exempted by law, to sell any goods, wares, or merchandise without a license from the proper authority, was prevented by the interstate commerce clause from being operative against one who, as the representative of a principal residing in another state, takes orders for the purchase of goods held in such other state; and who, when the goods are shipped by his principal, receives them, breaks the original packages in which they are contained, and distributes them among the customers from whom the orders were obtained, receiving from them the price of the goods.

In Huntington v. Mahan, 142 Ind. 695, 51 Am. St. Rep. 200, 42 N. E. 463, it was held that a state ordinance prohibiting peddling without a license was an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce where applied to a salaried agent of a publishing firm in another state, engaged in distributing to various purchasers books ordered through another agent, which had been shipped, in response to such orders, to a central point in the state, where they were repacked in parcels to suit the orders from various localities, to which they were reshipped for distribution.

In Turner v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 545, 55 S. W. 834, a statute imposing a tax upon the occupation of a traveling person engaged in selling patent and other medicines was held unconstitutional as applied to one employed by a nonresident concern, on salary, to sell goods by sample, the orders secured being transmitted to the employer, subject to his approval, to be filled, whereupon the goods were shipped consigned to the employer, and delivered direct from the car, though the packages were not marked with the name of each purchaser.

In Re Spain, 14 L.R.A. 97, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 738, 47 Fed. 208, a statute imposing a license tax on peddlers was held to be an unconstitutional regulation of interstate commerce, as applied to persons engaged in showing samples of goods manufactured by their principal in another state, and in taking orders for such goods, which are transmitted to the principal to be filled, even though in filling such orders the articles are sent in bulk to the agent, to be distributed by him.

In Menke v. State, 70 Neb. 669, 97 N. W. 1020, it was held that an agent soliciting orders for groceries, and sending such orders to a nonresident corporation in another state to fill, such corporation thereupon putting up the several items of goods named Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, it was also said: "This kind of taxation is usually imposed at the instance and solicitation of domestic dealers as a means of protecting them from foreign competition. And in many cases there may be some reason in their desire for such protection. But this shows in a still stronger light the unconstitutionality of the tax." While ordinarily we are not permitted to inquire into the motive of the legislature, yet, as said by the court in the case of Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1133: "It is impossible for us to shut our eyes to the fact that many of the laws of this character, while passed under what is claimed to be the police power for the purpose of protecting the public health or welfare, are in reality passed from other motives. We are justified in saying so when, from the character of the law and the subject upon which it legislates, it is apparent that the public health or welfare bears but the most remote relation to the law. The purpose of a statute must be determined from the natural and legal effect of the language employed; and whether it is or is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States must be determined from the natural effect of such statutes in each order separately, shipping the same in a large box to its order, the agent receiving the same and delivering the goods therein contained to the persons from whom orders had been taken, receiving the money therefor, was engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, and therefore could not be subjected to a peddler's license tax.

In Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 51 L. ed. 295, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, it was held that interstate commerce is unlawfully burdened by a municipal ordinance exacting a license fee from a person employed by a foreign corporation to solicit, within the municipality, orders for groceries which the company fills by shipping goods to him for the delivery to, and collection of the purchase price from, a customer, who has the right to refuse the goods if not equal to the sample, such goods always being shipped in distinct packages corresponding to the several orders, except in the case of brooms, which, after being tagged and marked like other articles, according to the number ordered, are then tied together in bundles of about a dozen, and wrapped up conveniently for shipment.

But, where the agent is treated by the shipper as the real party to the transaction, the courts regard the sales by the "agent" to his customers as domestic, and not interstate, transactions.

Thus, in People v. Smith, 147 Mich. 391, 110 N. W. 1102, it was held that a municipal ordinance requiring hawkers and peddlers to be licensed was applicable, without unlawfully interfering with interstate commerce, to an agent soliciting orders which he transmitted to his principal's warehouse in another state, where the goods were put up in packages corresponding with the order cards, packed in boxes, and shipped to the agent, no particular package being put up for any particular customer, and no package marked with the name of the customer, and no account being made or kept with any person other than the agent; the method employed in sending the goods being an attempt to evade a local regulation, and not a good-faith engagement in interstate commerce.

And in New Castle v. Cutler, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 612, it was held that an ordinance 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

imposing, for the purpose of revenue, a license tax on all peddlers, hucksters, and persons traveling from house to house with goods, wares, merchandise, or products of any kind for sale, was not unconstitutional as applied to one who took orders for groceries on behalf of principals in another state, to whom such orders were transmitted, and who thereupon placed in a car a sufficient quantity of goods to fill them, mostly put up in packages ready for delivery and placed in open boxes, none of the packages being marked or labeled with the name of the purchaser, but the goods being consigned to the shippers themselves, the shippers retaining the custody and control of the goods until actual delivery, when the purchase price was paid to the agent making the delivery; as the sale of the goods was not in original packages, and the transaction was one of domestic, rather than interstate, commerce.

And in Kimmell v. State, 104 Tenn. 184, 56 S. W. 854, a statute imposing a privilege tax was held not to interfere with interstate commerce as applied to an agent who, after taking orders for goods, forwarded them to his principal outside the state, and to whom the goods to fill the orders were consigned and charged individually, and without reference to the persons to whom he sold them; the sales not being of the original package, which was broken before the sales were completed.

So, also Croy v. Obion County (Croy v. Epperson) 104 Tenn. 525, 51 L.R.A. 254, 78 Am. St. Rep. 931, 58 S. W. 235, it was held that one who takes orders in his own name, from house to house, for articles manufactured in another state; and who, in his own name, sends a single order to the manufacturer, without stating the names of his customers, and, on receiving the package containing the articles, delivers therefrom the separate articles to his customers,—is not engaged in interstate commerce so as to be exempt from a tax on the privilege of selling articles of that kind within the county.

—as affected by presence of goods within the state.

when put into operation, and not from their proclaimed purpose. Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 185, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862; Brimmer v. Rebman, 138 U. S. 78, 35 L. ed. 862, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 485, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213. The court looks beyond the mere letter of the law in such cases. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064.

We are well satisfied that the act has no such relation to the public health or morals as will sustain it as a police measure. Nor can it, because of its illegal discrimination as to property and persons, be upheld as a revenue measure. We think it repugnant to the provisions of the Federal Constitution that no state shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States nor deny to persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whether it is also in conflict with the provisions of the state Constitution requiring all laws of a general nature to be uniform in operation, we need not now determine. The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action and to discharge the defendants.

McCarty, Ch. J., and Frick, J., concur.

shipped into the state, which, by reason of having been taken from their original package, or from some other cause, have ceased to be articles of interstate commerce, the transaction is not within the protection of the commerce clause.

In Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367, affirming 103 Mo. 241, 11 L.R.A. 219, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 527, 23 Am. St. Rep. 874, 15 S. W. 81, a state statute requiring every peddler to procure a license and pay a tax therefor, under penalty, was held not to be repugnant to the commerce clause, as applied to a peddler, within the state, of sewing machines made in another state by a corporation of that state, and sent by it to him to sell, on its own account, and as its agent. The court said: "The defendant's occupation was offering for sale and selling sewing machines, by going from place to place in the state of Missouri, in a wagon, without a license. There is nothing in the case to show that he ever offered for sale any machine that he did not have with him at the time. His dealings were neither accompanied nor followed by any transfer of goods or of any order for their transfer, from one state to another, and were neither interstate commerce in themselves, nor were they in any way directly connected with such commerce. The only business or commerce in which he was engaged was internal and domestic; and, so far as appears, the only goods in which he was dealing had become a part of the mass of property within the state. Both the occupation and the goods, therefore, were subject to the taxing power, and to the police power, of the state."

In Re Wilson, 8 Mackey, 341, 12 L.R.A. 624, it was held that there is no unconstitutional regulation of commerce in requiring the agent of a nonresident manufacturer who sells at wholesale merchandise in small packages which are packed in boxes for transportation, under an agreement that he will sell the contents of a certain percentage of the boxes at retail from house to house as an advertisement, and credit the wholesale purchaser with the proceeds, to procure a peddler's license; and that it is immaterial whether the boxes which the agent is to dispose of are shipped directly to him, or reach him indirectly through the wholesale purchaser.

In Hall v. State, 39 Fla. 637, 23 So. 119, it was held that a statute imposing a license tax on hawkers and peddlers was not unconstitutional as applied to one bringing in goods from another state for the purpose of sale at retail, where it appeared that all negotiations prior to and attending the sales were had with reference to goods then present in the state, which were not sold in the original packages, but retailed in small quantities.

In Re Abel, 10 Idaho, 288, 77 Pac. 621, it was held that a statute providing for the licensing of peddlers, hawkers, and solicitors may be constitutionally applied to an agent or solicitor who has the goods which he is selling with him at the time of the sale; the business or commerce in which such agent is engaged being internal and domestic, and therefore subject to the taxing power and to the police power of the state.

In South Bend v. Martin, 142 Ind. 31, 29 L.R.A. 531, 41 N. E. 315, it was held that an ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by hawkers and peddlers did not interfere with interstate commerce in the case of a peddler of chairs imported into the state before his employment began, even though sales made by him were conditional, the title remaining in the foreign owner.

In Re Pringle, 67 Kan. 364, 72 Pac. 864, an ordinance imposing a license tax upon peddlers is held constitutional as applied to a person who takes orders from samples for goods which he engages to deliver, and which are to be shipped into the state from another state, when such orders are not transmitted to such other state, or filled there, but are filled from goods, not in the original package of importation, sent to him in bulk C. O. D. from such other state.

In People v. Sawyer, 106 Mich. 428, 64 N. W. 333, a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee upon peddlers was held constitutionally applicable to a resident of the state whose sales were made from a general stock of goods kept in the state, and not in original packages.

In Muskegon v. Hanes, 149 Mich. 460, 112 N. W. 1077, it was held that there was no interference with interstate commerce in requiring a license of one to whom goods were shipped in bulk, and by whom they were distributed from house to house with the statement that within a certain time thereafter a collector would call for the merchandise or for the pay therefor.

In State v. Smithson, 106 Mo. 149, 17 S. W. 221, it was held that no constitutional question was raised in a prosecution for peddling medicine without a license, where it did not appear that the medicines sold were manufactured beyond the limits of a state, or whether, when sold, they were in the original package or otherwise.

In State v. Parsons, 124 Mo. 436, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 250, 146 Am. St. Rep. 457, 27 S. W. 1102, affirmed in 166 U. S. 718, 41 L. ed. 1187, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 997, it was held that a statute requiring a peddler's license to be taken out by persons going from place to place selling medicine did not interfere with interstate commerce when applied to one vending single bottles of medicine manufactured in another state, and which were taken from a box in which several bottles separately wrapped were shipped into the state, such separate bottles not being considered as the original package.

In State v. Gorham, 115 N. C. 721, 25 L.R.A. 810, 44 Am. St. Rep. 494, 20 S. E. 179, it was held that a license tax on the business of putting up lightning rods is not a tax on interstate commerce, in the case of a person who puts up no rods except those which he sells and which are brought from another state, although he puts them up without extra charge.

In Com. v. Harmel, 166 Pa. 89, 27 L.R.A. 388, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 89, 30 Atl. 1036, it was held that a statute requiring a license to be obtained by persons engaged in peddling clocks was not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce as applied to the peddling of separate articles after the package in which they were shipped from another state had been broken.

In Ex parte Butin, 28 Tex. App. 304, 13 S. W. 10, it was held that a statute imposing an occupation tax upon every person or firm who peddles out clocks, cooking stoves, or ranges, was not, as applied to the sale of ranges shipped into the state to distributing points, where they were loaded upon wagons in charge of canvassers, who made sales and delivery of goods from the wagons to the purchasers, obnoxious to the interstate commerce provision of the Federal Constitution.

In French v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 222, 52 L.R.A. 160, 58 S. W. 1015, and Kirkpatrick v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 459, 60 S. W. 672, an attempt was made to follow the case of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681 (the "original package" case), by holding, in each case respectively, that the peddling of organs, and of buggies, shipped into the state by a non-resident manufacturer, was within the protection of the commerce clause; the court saying: "If interstate commerce protects 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) an article of traffic, between states in transit, and after its arrival at a warehouse, and until it is sold therefrom and delivered thence to the purchaser by the seller, who acts as the agent of the foreign company, it is difficult to see how the same article will not be protected while the agent of the foreign company carries it around with him, and, when he finds a purchaser, then sells and delivers it to such purchaser." But these decisions were overruled in Saulsbury v. State, infra, in which the court said that, at the time of deciding the French and Kirkpatrick Cases, its attention had not been called to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Emert v. Missouri.

In Saulsbury v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 90, 96 Am. St. Rep. 837, 63 S. W. 568, it was held that one to whom buggies were shipped, knocked down, and who took them from the original packages and put them together, proceeding over the country carrying one or two with him, which he offered for sale, was not engaged in interstate commerce, so as to exempt him from the payment of a tax upon the occupation of peddling buggies.

In The Stella Block v. Richland Parish, 26 La. Ann. 642, it was held that a parish might, without infringing upon the commerce clause, impose a license upon a steam-boat trader.

In Cole v. Randolph, 31 La. Ann. 535, it was held that a statute imposing a license tax upon all transient persons doing business or selling in the state was not unconstitutional in its application to a flat-boat trader engaged in selling goods brought by him from another state.

In Hynes v. Briggs, 41 Fed. 468, a statute imposing an occupation tax upon clock peddlers, agents for the sale of lightning rods, and stove-range agents doing business in the state, was held not to interfere with interstate commerce, as applied to the agent of a nonresident corporation engaged in selling stove ranges, shipped from the state where they were manufactured into the state enacting the statute, to be thereafter sold, sales being made and the orders filled from the ranges so stored within the state.

In American Harrow Co. v. Shaffer, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 336, 68 Fed. 750, it was held that, where a manufacturer shipped harrows by car-load lots from Michigan into Virginia, and deposited the goods in a warehouse in the latter state, and then, through its agents, loaded them on a wagon and sent them through the country, selling and delivering them to purchasers from the wagon, such agents were not engaged in interstate commerce, and were therefore subject to the payment of local license taxes.

In Duncan v. State, 105 Ga. 457, 30 S. E. 755, it was held that the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution has no application to sales of goods in the state, when it appears that the same had been manufactured in another state, shipped in quantities to an agent of the manufacturer residing in the state, by him deposited in a warehouse, and from thence delivered on retail orders obtained by a traveling agent of the manufacturer.

In L. B. Price Co. v. Atlanta, 105 Ga. 358, 31 S. E. 619, it was held that sales of goods, which had been shipped in large quantities from another state to a warehouse, where they were divided and distributed among a number of customers who were procured after the goods had been deposited in the warehouse by a person who went from house to house exhibiting samples and taking orders, which were filled from the warehouse, did not constitute interstate commerce so as to exempt a person so selling them from a license tax imposed by a municipality upon canvassers.

In Muskegon v. Zeeryp, 134 Mich. 181, 96 N. W. 502, a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee upon peddlers was held not unconstitutionally to interfere with interstate commerce when applied to one taking orders on behalf of a nonresident principal, which he did not send to his principal, but, instead, ordered from the principal's warehouse in the state a sufficient quantity of merchandise to fill them, being himself charged with the price thereof.

In State v. Snoddy, 128 Mo. 523, 31 S. W. 36, it was held that one engaged in selling harrows as an agent and traveling salesman of a concern located in another state, which shipped its harrows to an agent by whom a single or sample harrow, as occasion might require, was loaded upon a wagon and sent through the county, in some cases being sold outright, and in other cases a written order being taken, which was filled by delivery of the one in the wagon, or of one from the warehouse, was not engaged in interstate commerce so as to preclude the enforcement of a statute requiring peddlers to obtain a license.

In State v. Richards, 32 W. Va. 348, 3 L.R.A. 705, 9 S. E. 245, a statute requiring a license to be obtained by agents traveling with one or more horses and selling any lightning rod, sewing machine, or organ or other musical instrument, was held not unconstitutional as applied to such agents selling sewing machines then in their possession inside the state, obtained from the storehouse of the manufacturer within the state, though such machines were manufactured outside the state.

In Re Nichols, 48 Fed. 164, and in Re Tyerman, 48 Fed. 167, an ordinance not purporting to be a police regulation, but solely for the purpose of raising revenue, requiring the payment of a license fee by all persons canvassing or soliciting orders for goods, books, paintings, wares, or merchandise of any kind, or persons delivering such articles under orders so obtained or solicited, was held void as a regulation of interstate commerce, so far as applied to an agent soliciting orders for books, to be filled on approval of his principal in another state, or as applied to an agent engaged in delivering the books and collecting the price therefor, notwithstanding that such principal has a branch office or storeroom in the state, which is kept replenished from the main office in another state, and from which the books are sent which are needed to fill the orders taken by the canvassers.

And in Henderson v. Ortte, 114 La. 523, 38 So. 440, it was held that the vender of sewing machines in their original packages could not constitutionally be subjected to a peddlers' license tax.

In this connection, see also note to Sucker State Drill Co. v. Wertz, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 134, on "Sale by foreign corporation of goods stored in state, as intrastate commerce."

—sale of picture frame as incidental to transaction protected by commerce clause.

A distinctive aspect of the question under discussion is presented where one who has, as a transaction of interstate commerce, ordered a picture, is given the option of purchasing a frame delivered with it. As to whether the sale of the frame under such circumstances is within the protection of the commerce clause, the decisions are in conflict.

In Dozier v. State (Ala.) 46 So. 9, where orders obtained by solicitors for enlarging photographs stated that it was also understood that the portrait was to be delivered in an appropriate frame, which the customer was entitled to accept at factory price, not being bound, however, to do so, the sale of the frames in such manner after they had come into the state was held not to constitute interstate commerce so as to preclude the application of a statute imposing a license tax upon any person selling picture frames.

In State v. Montgomery, 92 Me. 433, 43 Atl. 13, it was held that the agent of a concern having its place of business in another state, for which orders for the enlargement of pictures had been obtained, such orders stating that the picture would be delivered in an appropriate frame, which the customer was advised, but not compelled, to buy, who was engaged in delivering such pictures and frames, might constitutionally be required to obtain a peddler's license; the court saying: "The goods which this defendant is complained of for exposing for sale had been received by him within this state. He had broken the packages. He was traveling with them as a peddler. They had become a part of the general mass of property in the state. Hence, a statute regulation break was in this weld; that the defect in the weld was latent, and could not be discovered by any external examination, and only appeared after the weld was broken; and that the hidden defect in the weld caused the cord to break, and the bridge, which was supported by the cord, to collapse.

We are of opinion that the evidence fails to sustain the contention of the defendant in error that the accident was caused by the stringers slipping off of the floor beams, and establishes the theory of the plaintiff in error that the accident resulted from the defective weld which caused the cord supporting the entire structure to break, thereby effecting the inevitable collapse which followed.

The witnesses introduced by the defendant in error for the purpose of showing that the bridge was not in a safe condition were without knowledge or experience in the construction of bridges or in bridge engineering. They do not profess to know that the stringers were in an unsafe condition, or whether they had been built into the bridge as situated when seen by them. They do not say that the slipping of the stringers, which they supposed had taken place, caused or contributed to the accident. They merely state, without having made any measurement, that the stringers only rested upon the floor beams $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches; the statement that they had slipped being mere assumption. Further, these witnesses made their observations of the stringers in most instances some time before the accident, and locate most, if not all, of the stringers observed by them at a point other than the section of the bridge where the collapse occurred. This theory of the defendant in error, that the stringers had slipped and thereby caused the accident, is, however, shown to be fallacious and without foundation by the testimony of competent experts, whose evidence is not in conflict with the plaintiff's witnesses, who admit their inability to say whether the conditions they describe did, or did not, cause or contribute to the collapse of the bridge.

Two experts were introduced by the plaintiff in error,—one a bridge builder and the other a bridge engineer,—both competent, with long experience in their line and familiar with the character and construction of the bridge in question. They show that the conditions described by the plaintiff's witnesses, if true, could not have caused the accident, and did not in any way contribute thereto. The undisputed testimony of these experts is that, if the stringers had slipped and fallen, it would not have caused the bridge to fall, for the reason that the stringers get their support, in part, from the

These experts explain the mechanism of the bridge, and show that, while it is built in six sections of $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet each, yet these sections are all connected into one entire span which makes the whole bridge. The iron cords which unite these several sections and bind them into one span are what holds up the bridge, the stringers performing no function of that sort. If one of these cords breaks, the bridge falls. It is further shown that, if one or more of the stringers had slipped from the beams and fallen into the creek, neither the bridge nor the car would have fallen from that cause.

These experts inspected the bridge after it had fallen, and found no unsound or broken timbers therein, and found no faulty condition of anything about the bridge, except the defect in the loop of the bottom cord, where there had been an imperfect weld. The broken cord was produced in court, and the unqualified testimony of these experienced bridge men is that the breaking of that cord was the sole cause of the accident, and that the defect in the cord was the imperfect weld, which could not have been detected by the utmost scrutiny.

"Where the accident arises from a hidden and internal defect, which a careful and thorough examination would not disclose, and which could not be guarded against by the exercise of a sound judgment and the most vigilant oversight, then the proprietor is not liable for the injury, but the misfortune must be borne by the sufferer as one of that class of injuries for which the law can afford no redress in the form of a pecuniary recompense." 2 Hutchinson, Carr. 3d ed. §§ 903, 904. The liability of a carrier of passengers as thus defined is now almost universally adopted.

As a matter of course, there can be no negligence where there is no breach of duty. It must appear, therefore, not only that the defendant owed a duty, but also that he did not perform it; and, if the accident complained of was inevitable, it is not a case of negligence. An accident is inevitable if the person by whom it occurs neither has, nor is legally bound to have, sufficient power to avoid it or prevent its injuring another. In such a case the essential element of a legal duty is wanting, and it cannot, therefore, be a case of negligence. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 15, 16.

Applying these well-settled principles to the established facts in the case before us, the conclusion cannot be escaped that the accident under consideration was one of those inevitable and unavoidable casualties which human care and foresight could not have provided against; and that no liability attaches to the plaintiff in error on account thereof.

Notwithstanding the conclusion reached on the merits, the case must, under our practice, be remanded for another trial if the plaintiff be so advised. It is therefore necessary that objections taken to two of the instructions given by the circuit court should be considered.

The first of these is instruction No. 4, given on behalf of the plaintiff, which is as follows: "The slightest neglect against which human prudence and foresight might have guarded, and by reason of which the injury may have been occasioned, renders the Roanoke Railway Company liable in damages for such injury."

The objection made to this instruction is that the jury are told that negligence that may have occasioned the plaintiff's injury will justify a recovery; it being insisted that the negligence must have caused the injury in order to justify a recovery.

This instruction, in the same language that is here employed, has been more than once approved by this court in cases of a like nature. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 29 Gratt. 431, 26 Am. Rep. 384; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Noell, 32 Gratt. 394. In both of these cases the accident resulted to a passenger from the falling of a railroad bridge. An examination of the records and the briefs filed in both cases shows that the same objection and the same argument in support thereof was there made to this instruction that is now made.

In the first case cited Judge Staples, speaking for a unanimous court, in referring to this instruction in common with four others, says: "We do not deem it necessary to enter into any discussion of the propositions of law involved in these instructions. It is sufficient to say that they are fully sustained by the elementary writers and by the opinions of the most respectable courts in this country."

The Case of Noell, supra, is to the same effect.

In the light of these authorities, the objection to the instruction under consideration was properly overruled.

The second objection taken by the plaintiff in error is to the modification made by the circuit court of its instruction No. 2. The instruction as asked for was as follows: "The jury are instructed that the plaintiff, in order to recover in this case, must establish the negligence of the defendant by evidence sufficient to satisfy reasonable and well-balanced minds. They are further instructed that the evidence must show more than a probability of a negligent act, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the plaintiff cannot recover if it is just as probable that the accident in which the plaintiff was injured resulted from one of two causes, for one of which the defendant is not responsible."

This instruction was modified by the court, and made to read as follows: "The jury are instructed that the plaintiff, in order to recover in this case, must establish the negligence of the defendant by evidence sufficient to satisfy reasonable and well-balanced minds, and the evidence must show more than a probability of a negligent act; but, when the plaintiff has shown that she was injured by the breaking down of the bridge and overturning the car, then this is sufficient proof of negligence on the part of the defendant company to meet the requirements above stated, and then the burden of proof is on the company to establish, by a preponderance of evidence, that it has been guilty of no negligence whatsoever which caused the accident, and the damage has been occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent."

There was no error in this action of the circuit court. Under the instruction, as asked for, the defendant company would merely have to raise a doubt as to the cause of the accident, and thereby shift to the plaintiff a greater burden than the law imposes in such cases. In the case of a passenger, when the plaintiff shows that his injury resulted from an accident which was caused by the breaking down of one of the carrier's bridges, it is sufficient proof of negligence on the part of the defendant company to put the burden upon it of establishing, by a preponderance of evidence, that the accident and the resulting damage was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented. The presumption of negligence suggested does not arise from the abstract fact of an accident to a passenger, but arises from a consideration of the nature and quality of the accident; and it must appear that it was such an accident as does not, in the usual course of things, happen to passengers when due care is exercised on the part of the carrier. 3 Thomp. Neg. § 3484; Richmond R. & Electric Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 409, 41 S. E. 736.

Because of the error of the Circuit Court in not setting aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence, its judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

E. L. FARNSWORTH, Resp't.,
v.

TOWN OF WILBUR et al., Appts.

(49 Wash. 416, 95 Pac. 642.)

Judgment— injunction — regularity.

1. A judgment enjoining the performance of a contract which has already been performed is irregular.

Equity — injunction — closed transaction.

2. Upon a petition to enjoin a town from carrying out an illegal contract consisting of the satisfaction without consideration of a judgment recovered by it, which has in fact been done, a court of equity may set aside the satisfaction and restrain the parties from carrying out the agreement.

Town — satisfaction of judgment — authority.

3. A town council has no authority to satisfy a judgment obtained by the town upon payment of the costs of the action, since such satisfaction is in fact a gift to the judgment debtor which the council has no power to make.

(May 11, 1908.)

Case Note. — Right of town, county, or municipality to surrender valid claim upon a partial payment thereof.

The right of a public corporation to compromise claims or judgments in its favor is usually sustained in the absence of fraud or collusion, unless the compromise is made for the purpose of making a gift or donation to the other party thereto, rather than for purposes which, as to private individuals, are recognized as lawful and valid objects for compromise or settlement.

Judgments.

Most of the cases passing upon the question wherein the foregoing doctrine has been enunciated or applied have been considering claims as to which there was a chance for further litigation, rather than, as in FARNSWORTH v. WILBUR, claims that had already been reduced to judgment, and as to which the right to an appeal had expired prior to the settlement, or as to which no right of appeal existed. Such a case, however, was considered by the court in Collins v. Welch, 58 Iowa, 72, 43 Am. Rep. 111, 12 N. W. 121, wherein the right of the board of supervisors to compromise a judgment for taxes was sustained, although no question was raised in regard to the validity of the judgment, and it had, at the time of the compromise, become a claim to be enforced by execution, and although the plaintiff taxpayers who sought a writ of certiorari for the purpose of testing the power of the board of supervisors to make the compromise, and to set it aside if it should be found that the power did not exist, al-

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lincoln County enjoining the satisfaction of a judgment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. F. Scarborough and Neal, Sessions, & Myers for appellants.

Messrs. Merritt, Hilschman, Oswald, & Merritt for respondent.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for injunctive relief. It was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts: "(1) That the town of Wilbur is a municipal corporation of the state of Washington, organized and existing as a city of the fourth class under, and by virtue of the laws of the said state relative to municipal corporations.

"(2) That the defendants L. Lewis, W. W. Howells, F. T. Bump, W. J. Browne, and James A. Muir are the duly elected, qualified, and acting members of the town council of the town of Wilbur.

"(3) That the defendant Peder Faldborg is the duly elected, qualified, and acting town treasurer of said town of Wilbur.

leged in their petition that the judgment debtors were solvent and able to pay the judgment in full. The decision of the court was based on its construction of § 303, subdiv. 11, of the Code, which, in substance, provides that the county supervisors are to represent their respective counties, and to have the care and management of the property and business of the county in all cases where no other provision is made. This section was said to authorize the board of supervisors to compromise the judgment if it acted in good faith. As to the claim that there was no basis for compromise in this case, because the judgment was a valid judgment, enforceable by execution, and the judgment debtors were solvent, the court said: "It is true that, where a claim has been reduced to judgment, all questions pertaining to the rightfulness of the claim have been adjudicated. But questions may arise subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, and, where they are of such a character as to render a compromise expedient, it is manifest that the board ought to have the power to make it. Suppose, for instance, that the financial condition of the judgment debtor is such that the board is unable to discover any way of collecting any part of the judgment. The board should have the power to accept a part in satisfaction of the whole, if, in its judgment, the best interests of the county would thereby be promoted. All rules of business conduct by which a prudent person is governed are applicable to a county in the management of its affairs under similar circumstances. It is true that in the case at bar the plaintiff avers that the judgment debtor

"(4) That, on or about the 13th day of March, 1906, judgment was entered by the superior court of the state of Washington in and for the county of Lincoln, in an action wherein the defendant the town of Wilbur was the plaintiff, and wherein one J. E. Nave, one E. H. Lewis, and one C. A. Person were defendants, for the sum of $1,000 and costs, and that thereafter the said J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person duly appealed to the supreme court of the state of Washington from the judgment aforesaid. That, on the 9th day of October, 1906, the said appeal was by the said supreme court dismissed, and that the said judgment was at the time of the dismissal of the appeal a valid, legal, and binding claim against the said J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person, to which there was no further defense of any nature; and said judgment still remains a valid, legal, and binding claim against said defendants J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person, unless it has been satisfied, settled, and discharged by reason of the facts hereinafter set forth; and that no part thereof has been paid, except the sum of $290.95, as hereinafter set forth. That an execution has been issued by the clerk of the superior court of the state of Washington for said county upon the judgment aforesaid, and that said execution is now in the hands of the sheriff of Lincoln county for the satisfaction of said judgment.

"(5) That, on the 21st day of November, 1906, at a regular meeting of the town council of the town of Wilbur, composed of the defendants L. Lewis, W. W. Howells, F. T. Bump, W. J. Browne, and James A. Muir, a resolution was introduced, seconded, and passed by the said defendants, to the effect that the said judgment should be satisfied and discharged upon the payment by the said defendants in the action wherein the judgment was entered, of the costs and expenses therein incurred by the said town of Wilbur, aggregating the sum of $290.95; and that the said town council and the defendants above named as members of the said council then and there agreed with the said J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person to accept from them in full satisfaction of the said judgment as a full discharge of all their liability to the said town of Wilbur under said judgment the sum above was solvent. But that averment is not material. We cannot go into any such question of fact in this action. The question before us is one of jurisdiction. If the board can make a compromise with an insolvent judgment debtor, it must be allowed to judge for itself in any given case as to whether the debtor is insolvent or not, and an error made in this respect, however great, would not affect its jurisdiction."

The doctrine of the Collins Case also finds support in Hagler v. Kelly, 14 N. D. 218, 103 N. W. 629. While in that case the court was considering the right of a county to sell a judgment, yet it reached its conclusion that the county might sell a judgment for less than its face, on the ground that it had the clear right to compromise a judgment. On this subject it is said: "It must be conceded that the board had the power to abate or compromise the tax which became merged in this judgment, if, in the fair exercise of its discretion, such action was advisable. . . . It is clear that this same power continued after the judgment was obtained. The duty of the county commissioners with respect to the collection of the taxes merged in this judgment was the same after as before the entry of the judgment. If they had the power to abate or compromise the claim, we can conceive of no valid objection to their right to effect the same result by selling the claim."

Where a county owned a judgment against its treasurer and bondsmen, each and all of whom were insolvent, and, as collateral thereto, a claim against an insolvent bank, no part of which was immediately collectable, and the ultimate value of which, and the time when such value would be realized by the county, were uncertain, it was held, in Washburn County v. Thompson, 99 Wis. 585, 75 N. W. 309, that it was competent for the county board to release one of the bondsmen, the president of the insolvent bank, and consent to a reassignment to the bank so that it could resume business with some prospect of ultimately paying its indebtedness, suspend further proceeding to collect such judgment, and extend the time for the bank to pay the claim, on condition of its giving a bond with sufficient sureties to make reasonably certain the payment of the indebtedness at the end of the extended period. The court, in reaching its conclusion, distinguished Butternut v. O'Malley, 50 Wis. 329, 7 N. W. 246, 248, in which a town board attempted to rebate a judgment which had been affirmed by the court of last resort, and the solvency of the judgment debtors was not questioned. The two cases may be said to establish the principle, so far as the Wisconsin courts are concerned, that a public corporation may compromise a valid claim if disputed before it is merged in a judgment, and thereafter, if the solvency of the debtors is questionable.

A similar doctrine was also enunciated in Standart v. Burtis, 46 Hun, 82, wherein taxpayers were allowed injunctions restraining a city from canceling and discharging a judgment in its favor on payment by the judgment debtors of a sum much less than its face, where it was alleged that the purpose of the settlement was to favor the debtor at the expense of the taxpayers of the city, and that the action of referred to and amounting to $290.95, as aforesaid.

"(6) That the said J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person, in pursuance of the resolution of the said town council of the said town of Wilbur, hereinbefore mentioned, paid to the treasurer of said town, and the treasurer accepted from the said defendants, the sum of $200, and the said defendants paid to the clerk of the above-named court the sum of $90.75 in full satisfaction and discharge of the said judgment, and thereafter the treasurer of the said town council of the said town of Wilbur paid the said sum of $200 into the treasury of the said town of Wilbur, which was thereafter used and expended by said town in its usual and ordinary course of business, and that the said town council of the said town of Wilbur has instructed the sheriff of Lincoln county, Washington, not to proceed under the execution placed in his hands referred to in paragraph 5 of the plaintiff's complaint herein.

"(7) That the plaintiff is a resident and taxpayer of the said town of Wilbur, and pays annually to the said town of Wilbur large sums of money as taxes, and that the said settlement of the said judgment by the defendant, as hereinbefore mentioned, will increase the taxes of this plaintiff and all other taxpayers of the said town of Wilbur to the extent of the reduction made on this judgment by said town council.

"(8) That the said J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person are the owners of property in Lincoln county, not exempt from execution, of the value of at least $1,200."

On the facts so stipulated, the trial court held that the town council was without power to settle and satisfy the judgment on the terms recited in the resolution, and entered a decree as follows: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants L. Lewis, W. W. Howells, F. T. Bump, W. J. Browne, James A. Muir, and Peder Faldborg, and their successors and each and all of them be, and they are hereby, perpetually enjoined from making any settlement with J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person upon the judgment and claim involved in this action for any sum whatsoever less than the full amount due to said town of Wilbur under said judgment; that they and their successors and each of them be perpetually enjoined from carrying out the agreement made with said Nave, Lewis, and Person for the settlement of said judgment for less than is due thereon to the defendant the town of Wilbur; that they and each of them and their successors in office be, and they are hereby, perpetually en-the board was in gross violation of law, and of their duties as officers of a municipality. and in violation of their duties to taxpayers of the city.

The doctrine that public corporations have the power to compromise judgments in favor of the corporation, where the time for an appeal from such judgments has not yet expired, is sustained by the great weight of authority. Thus, in Farnham v. Lincoln, 75 Neb. 502, 106 N. W. 666, the right of the officer of a municipality to compromise a litigation still pending in behalf of the city against a street railway company for taxes was sustained, although a judgment had been rendered in the lower court in behalf of the city for a much larger sum than that received in the compromise.

And in Agnew v. Brall, 124 Ill. 312, 16 N. E. 230, while it was recognized that a city council was without power to sell or in any manner dispose of the property of a corporation without consideration, or to discharge, without payment, a debt due a public corporation from parties who were solvent and responsible, where no controversy existed in regard to the validity and binding effect of the indebtedness, yet it was held that, where the city had obtained a judgment, but steps had been taken by the judgment debtor to appeal the same, on which appeal he would be entitled to a trial de novo, the transaction was one which was in the nature of a pending controversy, and as such the city council had the power to settle it by compromise.

To the same effect, under very similar facts, is Petersburg v. Mappin, 14 Ill. 193, 56 Am. Dec. 501.

In reaching the same conclusion as to the right of a board of supervisors to settle a judgment in favor of a county, but from which an appeal had been taken which was still pending, in Orleans County v. Bowen, 4 Lans. 24, the court said: "The power to commence and prosecute actions necessarily includes and comprehends the power to finish them, and to determine how far they shall be carried on, and in what manner they may be ended. It includes the power to discontinue the action commenced, upon terms or otherwise, and to agree upon the terms. . . . It is claimed in behalf of the plaintiffs that what they undertook to do was to give away the corporate property, and that this was wholly beyond their power. But here was no gift in any just or proper sense of the term. It was a gift in the same sense that every party to a controversy gives when he relinquishes a portion of a claim he makes against his adversary to effect a settlement and avoid further litigation, and no other."

A case going to the extreme in sustaining this doctrine is Gering v. School Dist. 76 Neb. 219, 107 N. W. 250, wherein the right of a school district to make a compromise with its judgment debtor, against whom it held two judgments unappealed from, but from which the time to appeal had not yet joined and restrained from interfering in any manner whatsoever with the sheriff of Lincoln county in his efforts or attempts to proceed under the execution issued in said action; and that the said town of Wilbur, the town council of said town, the defendants above mentioned as councilmen, and their successors in office be, and they are hereby, required and commanded to have an execution issued on the said judgment and to take all other necessary steps and proceedings to collect in full all sums due to said town of Wilbur under and by virtue of said judgment against J. E. Nave, E. H. Lewis, and C. A. Person, and that they proceed immediately to collect for the said town of Wilbur and pay into the treasury of said town all sums due to said town in and by virtue of said judgment, to which defendants except and exception allowed."

From the judgment so entered, the town and its officers appeal.

In this court the appellants make two principal contentions: First, that the court was without power to enjoin a transaction that the proofs showed had been then committed; and, second, that a municipal corporation in this state has power and authority to compromise and satisfy a final judgment in its favor by taking a part for the whole, even though the judgment debtor has property out of which the judgment can be made on execution.

The judgment is irregular. The acts which the appellants were enjoined from committing were performed at the time the judgment was entered as fully and completely as the parties were capable of performing them, and the proper judgment would have been one vacating and setting aside the attempted compromise and settlement, and restraining the parties from carrying out the agreement. Such a judgment is within the powers of the superior court to enter when sitting as a court of equity. The powers of the court to grant injunctive relief are mandatory as well as prohibitive. It may, by its mandate, compel the undoing of those acts that have been illegally done, as well as it may, by its prohibitive powers, restrain the doing of illegal acts. Nor was it material in this case that the complaint asked for preventive relief rather than for a mandatory injunction vacating and setting aside what had been done. The plaintiff based his complaint for relief on the facts then in his possession. He did not know that the acts contemplated had been consummated. After the facts developed he was entitled to amend his complaint so as to make the pleadings and proofs correspond had objection been then taken as to its sufficiency. No such expired, by not only releasing and discharging the judgment debtor from all claims in reference thereto, but also paying him a sum of money, was sustained. One of the judgments compromised was rendered in an action by the judgment debtor against the school district, for costs of suit, and, of course, there was a chance of his reversing this judgment on appeal and securing a favorable judgment against the district.

In the following cases, also, the right of public corporations to compromise judgments in their favor, where the right to an appeal had not expired, was also sustained: State v. Davis, 11 S. D. 111, 74 Am. St. Rep. 780, 75 N. W. 897; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Anthony, 73 Mo. 431; Kinsley v. Norris, 62 N. H. 652; Mills County v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 47 Iowa, 66; Multnomah County v. Dekum (Or.) 93 Pac. 821.

Compromise of claims not reduced to judgment.

The question has arisen as to the right of a public corporation to accept from an officer having in charge its money a sum less than the full amount owing by him, where he has lost a portion of such money through some misfortune, as by theft; and it is very generally held by the courts that such circumstances do not present a proper ground for compromise, and that a settlement or compromise for less than the full amount of money owing by such officer is 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

invalid. Such was the holding of the court in the following cases: Jefferson County v. Lineberger, 3 Mont. 231, 35 Am. Ren. 462; Bland v. Orr, 90 Tex. 492, 39 S. W. 558; Com. v. Tilton, 111 Ky. 341, 63 S. W. 602.

To the same effect, as to moneys illegally allowed a county officer by the board of commissioners in a settlement with him, is Zuelly v. Casper, 37 Ind. App. 186, 76 N. E. 646.

But in Hancock County v. Bradley, 53 Ind. 422, the fact that the treasurer of a county had settled with the county commissioners for a sum less than the amount of which he was the custodian for the county, and which had been stolen from him, was held to be a good defense to an action against him and his bondsmen by the board, brought after such settlement.

In Behan v. Board of Assessors, 46 La. Ann. 870, 15 So. 397, the right of the mayor of a city to make a compromise with a college as to the number of students from the municipality which the college was to accept free of tuition was denied.

And in Delta County v. Blackburn, 100 Tex. 51, 93 S. W. 419, the right of the commissioners' court of a county to reduce the rate of interest on a contract for the purchase of real estate was denied. In this case, however, such a contract would have been invalid had it been made by private persons, because not based on a valuable consideration.

The second contention is of more difficulty, but we think the court rightly held that the attempted settlement was beyond the powers of the town council. It is true the council has the exclusive management of the fiscal affairs of the town, and must be accorded a somewhat wide discretion as to the manner in which it will conduct such affairs, yet we think this power does not enable them to give up to third persons the actual property of the town. No doubt the town council may legally compromise doubtful or disputed claims where they act in good faith and with ordinary discretion, but they cannot, under the guise of a compromise, surrender up valuable rights or claims over which there is no longer room for a substantial controversy. Such an attempt is a gift rather than a settlement of a doubtful or disputed claim, and gifts to private individuals are beyond the powers of the town.

For the irregularity first mentioned, however, the judgment must be reversed, with instructions to modify it in the particulars mentioned. It will be so ordered.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellant against the respondents to recover a balance alleged to be due upon three promissory

Case Note. — Authority of agent to accept chattel in payment of indebtedness due his principal.

The general doctrine that an agent with authority merely to collect an indebtedness cannot collect on such indebtedness anything but money is well settled. This doctrine was applied in Cram v. Sickel, 51 Neb. 828, 66 Am. St. Rep. 478, 71 N. W. 724, wherein it was held that an attorney holding a claim secured by a chattel mortgage was without power to settle with the debtor by taking the mortgaged property in full satisfaction of the debt which it was pledged to secure, unless he was specially authorized so to do.

And in Robinson v. Nipp, 20 Ind. App. 156, 50 N. E. 408, the doctrine was applied as to the right of an agent to deliver up the notes of his principal secured by a mortgage on chattels, and cancel the debt on condition that the mortgagor should turn over the property covered by the mortgage to him. The fact that the agent in question assisted in delivering the purchased property, received the notes given for the purchase price, demanded payment of the notes when due, took possession of the chattels turned over by the debtor, and sold the same as stipulated in the mortgage, was held not to be sufficient evidence of authority in the agent to make such an arrangement with the debtor.

To the same effect, as to an agent set-notes. The notes in question were executed by the respondents, and delivered to the Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company on December 30, 1892, and were secured by mortgage upon certain personal property. Foreclosure proceedings were begun in 1898, and the property taken from the possession of the mortgagors. Thereafter the appellant purchased the notes at a receiver's sale of the thresher company's assets, it having become insolvent. This action was brought on October 5, 1906. To the complaint, which was in the usual form, the respondents filed an answer in which they admitted the execution of the notes, but averred that the same had been paid and satisfied by an accord and satisfaction between the respondents and the Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company, made at the time of the ting with a mortgagor of real estate covered, is Rodgers v. Peckham, 120 Cal. 238, 32 Pac. 483.

This general doctrine was also applied in the following cases, wherein merchandise or other personal chattels were taken by an agent, whose authority was merely to collect for his principal, and who had no special authority to receive anything but money; and it was held that the receipt of chattels under such circumstances was not binding on the principal, and would not, apply on the indebtedness, if the principal had not received the benefit of it: Mudgett v. Day, 12 Cal. 139; Sioux City Nursery & Seed Co. v. Magnus, 1 Colo. App. 45, 27 Pac. 257; McLaughlin v. Blount, 61 Ga. 168; Reynolds v. Ferree, 86 Ill. 570; Kirk v. Hiatt, 2 Ind. 322; Aultman v. Lee, 43 Iowa, 404; Woodruff v. American Road Mach. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1551, 65 S. W. 600; Parker v. Leech, 76 Neb. 136, 107 N. W. 217; Loy v. McClure, 124 Mo. App. 689, 101 S. W. 1148; Wright v. Daily, 26 Tex. 730; Rhine v. Blake 59 Tex. 240; Mann v. Robinson, 19 W. Va. 49, 42 Am. Rep. 771; Wees v. Page, 47 Wash. 213, 91 Pac. 766.

In other jurisdictions it has been held that if the debtor, in turning over property to an agent to apply upon an indebtedness of the principal, knew, or had reason to believe, from the character of the property turned over, such as merchandise, that the agent would apply the same to his personal use and benefit, such property would not apply as payment, either in whole or in part, of the principal's indebtedness. L'Artiste Pub. Co. v. Walker, 11 Misc. 426, 32 N. Y. Supp. 151; Erie Preserving Co. v. Pearsall, 13 Jones & S. 636; Sier v. Bache, 7 Misc. 165, 27 N. Y. Supp. 255; Williams v. Johnston, 92 N. C. 532, 53 Am. Rep. 428; National Loan & Invest. Co. v. Bleasdale (Iowa) 119 N. W. 77.

The general doctrine that an agent merely to collect cannot accept anything but money in payment of his principal's indebtedness was applied in Taylor v. Robinson, 14 Cal. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mortgage foreclosure, by which the company took the mortgaged property and certain other property then owned by the respondents in satisfaction of the mortgage debt.

Whether or not such a settlement was made was the only issue between the parties. On the question the evidence was conflicting; but, since the trial judge found in favor of the respondents, we shall not disturb his findings. The witnesses were before him, and he is in a much better position to judge of the weight of the evidence than we are, who must take the evidence from the printed record. The appellant contends, however, that, conceding the respondents' version of the transaction to be true, the defense was not made out, since it was shown that the transaction was had with an agent of the Minnesota Thresher Manu-

396, in a controversy between the principal and a levying creditor of the debtor, who had levied upon the property taken by the agent as the property of the debtor. The claim was made that the property was the property of the debtor at the time of the levy, because the agreement with the agent of the creditor to take it to apply upon his principal's indebtedness was not binding until ratified, and that, before the ratification by the principal, the levy had been made. Applying the foregoing doctrine, this contention was sustained.

But, under a similar state of facts, except that the agent was given full authority to act for the principal in regard to his claim, the court, in Oliver v. Sterling, 20 Ohio St. 391, and Knowles v. Street, 87 Ala. 357, 6 So. 273, held that the title to the property passed from the debtor to the principal upon the consummation of the agreement with the agent; and that a levying creditor on the property, after such arrangement had been entered into, who levied upon it as the property of the debtor, could not hold it as the property of the debtor.

To the same effect, also, is Keating Implement & Mach. Co. v. Terre Haute Carriage & Buggy Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 32 S. W. 556. In this case the agent was authorized by telegraph to take chattels of the debtor upon the indebtedness.

In cases of general agency, where, as in NORTHWEST THRESHER CO. v. DAHLGREN, the agent is in possession of the property of the principal, selling the same, taking notes therefor and collecting the notes, and frequently taking property as part payment of the notes, or as part payment of the purchase price, the doctrine is applied that the principal, by allowing the agent so to conduct his business, renders himself obligated by the acts of his agent, outside the express or actual authority of the agent; and that therefore a payment to the agent in chattels is sufficient. Eggleston v. Advance Thresher Co. 96 Minn. 241, 104 N. W. 891; John Hutchinson Mfg. Co. v. Henry, 44 Mo. App. 263.

facturing Company, and it is not shown that he had authority to make such an agreement. But it was testified that the agent sold the machinery to the respondents for which the notes were given; that he received the notes and mortgage from the respondents; that he collected all payments made upon the notes, some of which payments were in the form of lumber and timber products; and that he conducted the foreclosure proceedings, and received on behalf of the company, not only the mortgaged property, but the other property not covered by the mortgage which the respondents turned over therewith. Here was such apparent general authority to deal with the notes as to warrant the conclusion that he had full power to make such a settlement, even as against the belated statement of an ex-officer of the corporation to the effect that the agent's authority was only to collect the notes.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WISCONSIN, Resp't.,
v.
CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL
RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Wis. —, 117 N. W. 686.)

Interstate commerce — railroad employees — congressional regulation — state action.

1. A regulation by Congress of the number of hours per day for which telegraph operators and train despatchers on interstate railroads may be employed inhibits state legislation upon the same subject,—especially such as limits such employment to fewer hours per day than allowed by Congress, and puts the regulation in force sooner than the time provided by the congressional act.

Same — Intrastate business.

2. A state statute applicable to every corporation operating a line of railroad wholly or partly within the state, which limits the hours during which its telegraph operators and train despatchers may be allowed to work, and which restricts the employment of all operators, without discrimination as to the character of their services, cannot be upheld as applying only to operators engaged exclusively on business wholly within the state.

Note. — As to state regulation of relations between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, see State v. Northern P. R. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 134, and case note thereto. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Act of Congress — constitutionality.

3. An act of Congress regulating the hours of labor of railroad employees engaged strictly in the business of interstate commerce cannot be annulled because not within its constitutional powers.

(September 29, 1908.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County imposing upon it a penalty for violation of the statute regulating the hours of labor of railroad telegraph operators. Reversed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

Action for penalty under chapter 575, p. 1188, of the Laws of 1907, for that, on the 11th day of January, 1908, one McGrath was a telegraph operator in defendant's station at Milwaukee, engaged in reporting and receiving orders affecting the movement of cars, engines, and trains of the defendant company, and operating signal devices; that on said day the defendant required, allowed, and permitted said McGrath to be and remain on duty for said defendant twelve consecutive hours, not by reason of any casualty upon said railroad. The answer set up numerous separate defenses, most of them attacking the validity of the state law as inimical either to the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution, or to certain provisions of our own Constitution; and some of them asserting certain technical grounds of escape from the words of the act. By the second and fifth defenses it was set forth that the defendant's road ran through several states; that it was engaged in both interstate and intrastate business by the same employees, trains, cars, appliances, and track; that it was unavoidable that the same operator should work upon all trains passing over the same division of the road, both those whose termini were wholly within the state and those which crossed the state line; that it was wholly impossible that either class of trains should be directed or governed by a separate man; that, during the excess time of employment of McGrath, there was one train as to which he made reports, received orders, etc., which ran wholly within the state and carried nothing of interstate commerce, but that the great majority of trains in any way acted upon by him were interstate-commerce trains; that any attempt to separate interstate from domestic commerce in the operation of trains and the regulation thereof by said operatives would result in great danger, delay, interference, and expense to the interstate commerce; that the statute in question was therefore void as restricting and regulating interstate commerce, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, conferring upon Congress the power to regulate such commerce, and also act Cong. March 4, 1907, chap. 2939, 34 Stat. at L. 1415 (U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p. 913), which prescribed a different and longer service for the same employees. The separate defenses of the answer were each met by a separate demurrer, except the first, which merely denied indebtedness for the penalty. The court below sustained the demurrer to all of said defenses, except the first. The defendant declining to amend, judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, with costs, from which the defendant appeals.

Mr. Burton Hanson, with Messrs. C. H. Van Alstine and H. J. Killilea, for appellant:

Congress has the exclusive right to regulate a train moving in interstate commerce, even though the regulation affects intrastate commerce carried on by means of the same train and the same operator.

United States v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, 85 C. C. A. 27, 157 Fed. 321.

In the absence of a law of Congress, the states may pass laws, under the police power, affecting, to some extent, subjects or things connected with interstate commerce.

A law of Congress governing the same subject or thing covered by a state law supersedes and displaces the state law.

As the act is not and cannot be limited to the regulation of intrastate commerce, it is in conflict with the Federal nine-hour law, and with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and is void.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The primary and most earnestly argued question is whether the act (Laws 1907, chap. 575, p. 1188, § 1816m) prohibiting a corporation operating a line of railroad in whole or in part in this state to require or permit any (telegraph or telephone) operator (including train despatcher) to remain on duty for more than one period of eight consecutive hours, so regulates interstate commerce intentionally or by necessary effect that it invades the power conferred upon Congress by article 1, § 8, Const. U. S. "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes," that it cannot stand. That the regulation of the relation between master and servant as to acts done in interstate commerce is within the power thus conferred upon Congress is authoritatively decided by the Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463, 494, 52 L. ed. 297, 307, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141. It is categorically so declared in the opinion of the court, although three of the five justices who concurred in the decision withheld their assent from this proposition, which, however, received the approval of the three justices who dissented from the ultimate decision. We can discover no distinction in principle between the subject of regulation considered in that case, namely, the responsibility of the employer for injuries to an employee, though due to the negligence of a fellow servant, and the subject of the act under consideration, which is the prohibition of employers from imposing upon employees excessive hours of labor. Both must seek their justification for governmental action in the same principles and reasons, either in the protection of a class of employees from requirements hurtful to them, or in the protection of the welfare and safety of the public and of the commerce from dangers supposed to arise by reason of burdensome responsibilities or perils imposed upon the employees of railroads. While the thing primarily regulated is not commerce, the regulation of the conduct of the individual while engaged in carrying on that commerce so directly affects it that the latter is thereby regulated.

But the mere fact that in some degree interstate commerce is affected by the act of a state legislature is not universally sufficient to condemn that act. The power of the state to control the conduct of individuals therein for the safety of the community is not taken away by the provision of the Federal Constitution above mentioned, merely because some fanciful or remote influence upon interstate commerce may result. Property may be taxed upon its value, although that value in part depends upon a franchise, or ability to use it, in interstate commerce, even though it may appear that the increased burden of taxation upon it must be paid out of the earnings of interstate commerce, and that, therefore, the charges upon such commerce will probably be increased. Dishonest practices by peddlers may be forbidden and punished by a state, notwithstanding they are practices by which some peddlers effect sales in the course of interstate commerce. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532. On the other hand, state legislation is prohibited which directly and intentionally controls and regulates interstate commerce, as, for example, an act which in terms regulates freight or passenger charges for interstate carriage, or which imposes a direct prohibition or charge upon the importation of property from one state into another. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 30 L. ed. 244, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 31, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062; Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1087. Between these two extremes, however, lies a broad field for legislation claimed to be justified by necessary protection of the safety of the local community, which more or less directly obstructs, restrains, and regulates the transaction of interstate commerce,—legislation not enacted for that purpose, but incidentally having the result. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, supra, has classified that field into three classes of legislative acts: The first, where the states have plenary power and Congress has no right to interfere, which concern the strictly internal commerce of the state, and, while the regulation may affect interstate commerce indirectly, its bearing is so remote that it cannot be termed in any just sense interference. The second includes cases of what may be termed "concurrent jurisdiction," where the states may act in the absence of congressional action. Obviously this field must be one where Congress has right and power to act if it sees fit, but where some restraint and regulation is necessary, and the authority therefor is deemed to be conceded to the states pending nonaction of Congress. The third is the class where, from the very intimacy with and directness of effect upon interstate commerce of any legislative action, and national scope of the subject of legislation, it is presumed that the refraining of Congress from promulgating any regulations must be considered to declare a policy that the subject shall be free from regulation.

Pretty obviously, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the act we are considering must fall in the second class. The safety of the public may be so imperiled by the employment of incompetent or disabled persons in and about railroads, navigation, and the like that the necessity for some legislation in regard thereto is manifest, and the forbearance of Congress to legislate might well be deemed significant of its policy to leave the subject of regulation to the legislatures of the several states. In this line, it has been held that examination of pilots or railroad engineers with reference to physical capacity, especially color blindness, as a condition of their employment, is competent for a state. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep.

564; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28. As pointed out in the latter case (page 101 of 128 U. S.): "Such legislation is not directed against commerce. It only affects it incidentally." In the former case it is suggested that acts much more intimately connected with the commerce itself would be competent, such as those requiring safeguards and signals in running trains, provision for the safety of passengers, regulating the manner of heating cars (New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 41 L. ed. 853, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418), regulating the speed of trains (Erb v. Morasch, 177 U. S. 584, 44 L. ed. 897, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 819), requiring the stopping of trains at certain stations (Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427, 41 L. ed. 1064, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627), and others of like import. From these we cannot doubt that prohibition of an overfatigued telegraph operator from directing the operation of trains falls within the state's power to control, even though thereby the conduct of interstate commerce might be impeded or burdened. But this power in the states is subject to that provision in the Constitution that Congress shall have power to regulate interstate commerce,—that is, to prescribe the restrictions and limitations under which it shall be conducted,—and, when it prescribes those regulations, it does so to the exclusion of state legislation accomplishing a like regulation directly or indirectly, and whether intended for that purpose or not. That is declared in all of the cases above cited, conceding to the states authority over such subjects in the absence of congressional legislation.

Within the field of authorized congressional action, the Federal power must, in the nature of things, be supreme in all parts of the United States. "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof . . . shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." U. S. Const. art. 6, § 2. In Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 318, 13 L. ed. 996, 1004, it was said of this class of legislation: "It is not the mere existence of such a power, but its exercise by Congress, which may be incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the states, and that the states may legislate in the absence of congressional regulations." In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 18 How. 421, 15 L. ed. 435, where a state law authorized the building of a bridge over a navigable water, it was declared that, even in the matter of a bridge, "if Congress chooses to act, its action necessarily precludes the action of the state." In United States v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. A.) 157 Fed. 321, 330, Sanborn, J., remarks: "The Constitution reserved to the nation the unlimited power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce; and, if that power cannot be effectually exercised without affecting intrastate commerce, then Congress may undoubtedly in that sense regulate intrastate commerce so far as necessary, in order to regulate interstate commerce fully and effectually. . . . That power is not subordinate, but it is paramount, to all the powers of the states. If its independent and lawful exercise of this congressional power and the attempted exercise by a state of any of its powers impinge or conflict, the former must prevail and the latter must give way." See also Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 209, 210, 6 L. ed. 23, 73. It will be observed from these utterances that it is not a mere question of conflicting laws in the two jurisdictions, so that the law of a state will be valid so far as not antagonistic to a Federal law. The question is more properly one of jurisdiction over the subject; the holding being that, within the second class of subjects above outlined, silence of Congress is deemed a relegation to the states of such jurisdiction and authority, but action by Congress upon the particular subject is deemed an assertion of the Federal power, a declaration of the policy that the subject shall be under Federal, and not state, regulation, and that, therefore, the power shall no longer rest in the state to exercise that authority which, by the Constitution of the United States, was surrendered to the Federal government when and if Congress deemed its exercise advisable.

On March 4, 1907, before the act now under consideration was passed, and even before it was introduced in the Wisconsin legislature, Congress had legislated fully upon the subject of hours of labor for the very class of employees affected by § 1816m. It then provided (act March 4, 1907, chap. 2939, 34 Stat. at L. 1415, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p. 913), that it should be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to require or permit any employee subject to the act to be or remain on duty for a period longer than sixteen consecutive hours; and that no operator or train dispatcher should be required or permitted to remain on duty for a longer period than nine hours in any twenty-four period in places continuously operated night and day, nor for a period longer than thirteen hours in places operated only during the daytime, with exceptions in case of emergencies. This was a clear declaration by Congress of a will and policy that, so far as the regulation and safeguarding of interstate commerce might properly be affected by prescribing hours of labor for such employees, the subject should be under control of Congress, and not of the state legislatures. Doubtless the state legislatures persisted in their power to protect the safety of their respective communities by reasonably regulating the hours of service of railroad employees, with the limitation, however, that they must not thereby restrict or effectively regulate interstate commerce. Under many of the decisions above cited, the state was thereby precluded from enacting any law of that sort which would have that effect, for the field of policy and legislation was thus assumed by Congress and withdrawn from state competency. State v. Missouri P. R. Co. 212 Mo. 658, 111 S. W. 500.

Apart from this view, however, it is too obvious to need more than statement that the legislation fixing nine and thirteen hours, respectively, as the permitted term of employment, was declaration of a Federal policy on that subject, and that a state law excluding interstate railways from the use of their employees on interstate commerce for one of the nine hours, or for five of the thirteen hours, would be in direct conflict with that policy. The absence of such an employee at a small station upon an interstate road might well be a most serious inconvenience and burden upon both the celerity and safety of interstate commerce past that station, and requirement of such absence would be in direct antagonism to the policy of the Federal law permitting presence and employment. Not less obviously, the act of Congress declared a policy that interstate railroads should have a reasonable time in which to adjust their business to the new restrictions, by postponing the date when the law should become operative for one year after its passage, thus indicating that such period of time was so necessary to reasonable convenience of interstate commerce. Indeed, this latter implication is not only clear from the act, but made the more certain by reference to the debates and reports of committees attending the consideration and passage of the law of Congress. Hence a state provision to the effect that the time for such preparation and adjustment should be restricted to the 1st of January, 1908, as contained in chapter 575, p. 1188, Laws of 1907, is in direct conflict with the policy of Congress. State v. Missouri P. R. Co. supra. We are therefore constrained to the conclusion that restriction of hours of labor of telegraph operators engaged in moving interstate trains or traffic is a field of legislation forbidden to the states by the Federal Constitution, but also that the limitation contained in our statute is in conflict with and in negation of the act of Congress, and cannot be enforced as to such employees.

It may not be out of place to reiterate, what has already been said, that the right of the state, in the sincere exercise of its police power, to protect its citizens generally from any perils resulting from excessive hours of labor by railroad employees, is in no way impaired by the Federal Constitution, except as such legislation shall interfere with or restrain interstate commerce in a respect in which Congress has deemed wise to regulate it. The conduct of persons within the state inimical to public safety is within the police control of the state, whether those persons be engaged in interstate commerce or not, so long as restrictions upon their conduct will not affect the interstate commerce. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 42 L. ed. 878, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488; Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 147, 148, 47 L. ed. 114, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 104, 6 L. ed. 23, 48; Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 52 L. ed. 778, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485.

The further contention is made by the respondent that, even if it be beyond the power of the state to restrict the services of an operator engaged in moving interstate trains, it is competent to so restrict as to one engaged exclusively upon trains or business wholly within the state, and that the law may be construed as so limited, and its validity as so limited be sustained. The principle invoked is doubtless sound, if it is reasonably possible to separate the permissible from the forbidden, and to believe that the legislature intended by the act to effect the one and omit the other. On this subject the Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463, 494, 52 L. ed. 297, 307, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141, are entirely germane and controlling. It is there pointed out that, by its terms, the act is aimed simply at the employer, and makes no distinction in denunciation of his acts, whether they be done in interstate or intrastate business, so that it in terms regulates purely domestic acts and transactions. Chapter 575, p. 1188, Laws of 1907, is even more objectionable in this regard than the employers' liability act; for it in terms is directed to every corporation operating a line of railroad, in whole or in part, in the state of Wisconsin, thus expressly including those who are engaged in interstate commerce. But it is also open to the other objection, held to be fatal, that it restricts the employment of all operators, without discrimination as to the character of their services. This alone, under the reasoning of the employers' liability act, supra, must condemn the state act; for it is matter of common knowledge, and is set up as a fact by the answer, that any operator who works upon trains or transportation wholly within the state also necessarily and at the same time works upon interstate trains and transportation. State v. Missouri P. R. Co. supra. The state legislature has in terms undertaken to restrict hours of work of employees engaged in safeguarding and conducting interstate commerce, as well as domestic; and, controlled as we must be by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court, we cannot import a meaning contradictory to the express words. Neither can we feel any certainty that the generality of the restriction was not an essential element in the entire legislative scheme, so that we might believe the legislature would have imposed upon domestic commerce, or on employees exclusively engaged therein, burdens not also resting on entirely similar acts of employees involving interstate trains or commerce.

Apart, however, from the controlling effect of the reasons urged in the Employers' Liability Cases, and in addition thereto, we think the impracticability, if not impossibility, of limiting hours of work devoted to domestic commerce alone is so obvious as to preclude belief in any such legislative purpose. That impracticability is largely shown by facts alleged in the answer, but also by facts which are matter of common knowledge. The direction and despatching of every train on an interstate railway necessarily involves knowledge in the train despatcher of all other trains which are in the same vicinity at the same time, and also ability to control such other trains. An interstate train from Milwaukee to Chicago cannot be safely forwarded if, under the direction of a separate employee, a local train may be moving between Milwaukee and Racine over the same track at the same time, or nearly so. The very switching at local stations must be within the knowledge and under the control of him who is to decide upon and direct the most important of interstate transportation. Obviously diversion of authority over these subjects would be fraught with great perils and delays to both kinds of transportation. Hardly any act of a train despatcher on a busy railroad can be conceived which does not affect both interstate and domestic commerce. He cannot move or stop the most distinctively local train without affecting the interstate train, or vice versa. No extra or special can be put on the division without adjustment of other trains. Of course, also, every interstate train carries some purely intrastate freight or passengers. Many purely domestic trains carry some freight or passengers in transit to extrastate destination. It would seem that any severance of control over state from interstate trains involved so much of confusion and probability of danger, and its possibility even is so doubtful and experimental, that no legislature would absolutely precipitate it without careful consideration, nor without providing in the act for the event of the failure of such experiments. For this reason as well, we are convinced that the legislative purpose involved what the legislative words include,—the regulation of services of all operators,—and would in no wise be satisfied, even in part, by a restriction to those whose acts affect only domestic commerce, if, indeed, there are any such.

But it is claimed that the Federal act of March 4, 1907, itself is unconstitutional upon the same ground that the employers' liability act was so held in the case already mentioned, reported at 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141. That case, from amongst great contrariety of opinion of individual justices, finally decided the very narrow proposition that the mere fact that a person or corporation is engaged in interstate commerce does not confer upon Congress authority to regulate its acts not connected with such commerce. The court took judicial notice of the fact that nearly all railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce are also engaged in business which is purely domestic to some individual state, as, for instance, in transportation wholly within the state, but also in the maintenance of factories and repair shops and other operations in no wise affecting interstate commerce. That law was addressed to every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and regulated every such common carrier in its relations with each and every of its employees, wholly without regard to the kind of service rendered by such employees. It was held that, by its terms, it sought to regulate that relation with employees not engaged in interstate commerce,—a boilermaker in its engine shops, a carpenter repairing its warehouses, or a sweeper in the barns of an express company,—and that, therefore, it was not within any power conferred upon Congress, notably not within that to regulate interstate commerce. The act of Congress of March 4, 1907, was passed after that case had been decided in the same way in the lower court, and after a writ of error had been for some time pending in the Supreme Court, and the Department of Justice had asked, and been granted, right to be heard on behalf of the United States on the question of constitutionality. The contention of those who attacked the employers' liability law was doubtless well known to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the Congress. It is therefore entirely natural and probable that an attempt would have been made to differentiate the latter enactment from the former one, and to escape the somewhat technical ground of invalidity in the former. It is without surprise, therefore, that we find such differentiating provision in the first section [34 Stat. at L. 1415, 1416, chap. 2939, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p 913], to the effect "that the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers, their officers, agents, and employees, engaged in the transportation of passengers," etc., between the several states; and also: "The term 'employees,' as used in this act, shall be held to mean persons actually engaged in or connected with the movement of any [interstate] train." It will also be noted that the hours of employment are prescribed for "any employee subject to this act." We cannot doubt that by these phrases the operation of the present act was limited, not only to employers engaged in interstate commerce, but to the conduct of employees so engaged, to the exclusion of any who might be engaged purely in the domestic affairs of the employer; and that by this very distinction and limitation of the application of the act the legislation is brought within that portion of the decision which holds that the employers' liability act would have been valid had it been confined in application to the relation of employees while engaged in interstate commerce. 207 U. S. at page 496.

Since our conclusion is fatal to chapter 575, p. 1188, Laws of 1907, no possible necessity for or benefit from a new trial can result. Hence:

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

MICHAEL HIROUX, Resp't.,

v.

JOHN BAUM et al., Appts.

(— Wis. —, 118 N. W. 533.)

Master — automobile — child.

1. A boy may be found to be the agent of his father in operating the latter's automobile, where it was purchased mainly at his solicitation, with the understanding that he was to learn to run it for the benefit of the family, if at the time in question he was operating the car under the instructions of the vendor.

Same — possession of machine — responsibility.

2. An automobile which has been purchased with the understanding that the son of the purchaser shall be taught to operate it may be found to be in possession of the son as agent of the purchaser, while the instructions are being given, and not in that of the vendor as an independent contractor.

Appeal — instructions — defect.

3. An inadvertent insertion of a word in an instruction to the jury is not reversible error where it operates in favor of the complaining party.

Damages — reviewing court — interference.

4. The reviewing court will not interfere with a verdict for $1,200 in favor of a man sixty-three years of age who was knocked down by an automobile, rendered unconscious, and suffered a contusion of the head and hip, and who at the time of the injury was earning $1.50 per day, and at the time of the trial, six months later, was unable to work, and for three weeks after the accident did not rest well, where at the later date the tenderness in the wounds had not disappeared, and in the opinion of a doctor was permanent.

(December 1, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

The plaintiff was at work sweeping one of the streets in the city of Green Bay, Wisconsin, and was run into and injured by an automobile owned by appellant John Baum. The appellant purchased the automobile a few days before the time of the accident, and had an understanding with Mr. Lucia, one of the members of the firm from whom the machine was purchased, that he would instruct the appellant's son, Cecil Baum, to run it. At the time of the injury Mr. Lucia and Cecil Baum were out with the machine, and Cecil was running it. Defendant Cecil was seventeen years of age, living with his father, who was a merchant doing business in Green Bay, and occasionally worked in his father's store. The complaint charges de-defendants with negligence, and that the defendant Cecil was acting as the agent and servant of the defendant John Baum, and that said Cecil, while in the employ and acting as the agent and servant of John Baum, and with his sanction and authority, drove an automobile belonging to the defendant John Baum carelessly and negligently, and ran into plaintiff, causing the injury. The defendant John Baum answered by general denial, and the defendant Cecil answered by his guardian ad litem, admitting that plaintiff was employed as a street sweeper by the city of Green Bay, and was, at the time of the accident, sweeping Main street, and was thrown upon the ground in the street, and that defendant Cecil is the son of defendant John Baum; and denied the other allegations of the complaint.

The jury returned the following verdict:

(1) Was Cecil Baum the servant and agent of the defendant John Baum in running the automobile at the time the plaintiff was injured?

Answer. Yes.

(2) If you answer the first question yes, then answer this: Was Cecil Baum acting within the scope of his employment while driving the automobile at the time of the injury?

Answer. Yes.

(3) Was Cecil Baum wanting in ordinary care in driving and managing the automobile prior to and at the time it struck the plaintiff?

Answer. Yes.

(4) If you answer the third question yes, then answer this: Was such want of ordinary care the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury?

Answer. Yes.

(5) If your answer to the third question should be "Yes," then answer this: Did any want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff contribute to his injury?

Answer. No.

(6) What amount of money would compensate the plaintiff for his injury?

Answer. Twelve hundred ($1,200) dollars.

The usual motions were made to amend the verdict, for judgment in favor of the defendant John Baum upon the verdict as amended, for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and for a new trial, which motions were denied, and due exceptions taken. Exceptions were also duly filed to the charge of the court to the jury. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict. from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. Aarons & Niven, for appellant John Baum:

of his minor child results from the rule of respondere superior only when the fact of the child's agency for the father is proven, and no presumption of agency results from the domestic relationship.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's theory of the case upon the trial below was that Cecil Baum was the agent or servant of appellant, and therefore the appellant was liable for Cecil's torts. The jury found for plaintiff upon that issue, and the question arises whether such finding has support in the evidence. It is insisted by appellant that it had not. There is evidence tending to prove that Cecil was seventeen years of age, lived with his father, occasionally worked in his father's store, but received no compensation for his services; that appellant bought the automobile from Lucia Brothers mainly upon the solicitation of his son, Cecil, about a week before the injury; that it was understood between appellant and Cecil that the latter should learn to run the automobile or car so purchased and teach the other members of the family to run it, or run it for their benefit; that, by agreement between appellant and Lucia, the latter was to teach Cecil to run the car, and it was understood, by arrangement between appellant and Cecil, that Cecil was to have the right to take the car whenever he had time, and, with the aid of Lucia, learn to run it. On the day in question Cecil took the car, and, at his request, Lucia went with him to teach him to run it, and, after going a considerable distance, Lucia turned the car over to Cecil to run, and Cecil was running it at the time of the injury; that, from the time of the purchase, the car was owned and controlled by appellant, and at the time of the injury was in the possession of Cecil, with the consent of appellant, for the purpose of learning to operate it under instructions from Lucia. The jury would be entitled to find the foregoing facts from the evidence. If Cecil was running the car by authority from appellant, that would be sufficient to make a prima facie case of master and servant. Gerhardt v. Swaty, 57 Wis. 24, 14 N. W. 851; Schaefer v. Osterbrink, 67 Wis. 502, 58 Am. Rep. 875, 30 N. W. 922; Davis v. Dregne, 120 Wis. 63, 97 N. W. 512; Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161. The foregoing cases are quite analogous in principle to the one before us, and we think support the ruling of the lower court that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the findings of the jury. On the question of the agency of Cecil we are cited by counsel for appellant to Kumba v. Gilham, 103 Wis. 312, 79 N. W. 325; Winkler v. Fisher, 95 Wis. 355, 70 N. W. 477; and Maddox v. Brown, 71 Me. 432, 36 Am. Rep. 330. In Kumba v. Gilham, supra, the son was clearly acting beyond the authority or direction of the father, and contrary to his desire. In Winkler v. Fisher, supra, the son disobeyed the express instructions of the father, and was not at the time of the injury in his father's employ in any sense whatever, but was acting contrary to his instructions. In Maddox v. Brown, supra, the son took his father's horse on business exclusively of his own, and without the knowledge of the father. The boy was in no way executing the orders of his father.

It is further insisted that Cecil was not the servant of appellant, but the servant of Lucia, an independent contractor, and Carl- son v. Stocking, 91 Wis. 432, 65 N. W. 58; Kuehn v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 263, 65 N. W. 1030; Bauer v. Richter, 103 Wis. 412, 79 N. W. 404; Smith v. Milwaukee Builders' & T. Exchange, 91 Wis. 360, 30 L.R.A. 504, 51 Am. St. Rep. 912, 64 N. W. 1041; Sal-lotte v. King Bridge Co. 65 L.R.A. 620, 58 C. C. A. 466, 122 Fed. 378; Bailey v. Troy & B. R. Co. 57 Vt. 252, 52 Am. Rep. 129; and King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37, are cited. We have carefully examined these cases, and cannot discover that they are controlling upon the question in appellant's favor. In Carlson v. Stocking, supra, there was evidence that one Frazer had full control of the dam and drive of logs in question, that he employed all the men, and furnished the supplies, and that the defendants were merely to pay him a compensation for driving their logs, the defendants participating in raising the dam and operating the same in making the drive at the time in question; and it was held that whether Fraser was an independent contractor was a question for the jury. In Smith v. Milwaukee Builders' & T. Exchange, contractors had agreed to erect a building according to fixed plans and specifications, and it was held they were independent contractors, although the owner reserved the right of inspection. In Kuehn v. Milwaukee, supra, one who had a contract with the city to remove garbage, with no right on the part of the city to control the mode or manner of performance of the contract, was held to be an independent contractor, although the city had the right to relet the contract in case of "improper or imperfect" performance. Other authorities cited by appellant under this head are similar in principle to the foregoing. The case before us turns upon whether or not Cecil was, at the time of the injury, in possession of and operating the car as servant of appellant, or whether Lucia had possession of it as an independent contractor. While we regard the question close, we have arrived at the conclusion that the jury was warranted upon the evidence, and the legitimate inference to be drawn therefrom, in finding that Cecil was the agent and servant of appellant in the operation of the car, and therefore cannot disturb the verdict upon that point.

2. Error is assigned upon the following portion of the charge: "Now, if you are satisfied from all the circumstances of this case,—you must take into consideration just what the young man was doing, what experience he had had, and what he knew about operating the machine, and what was on the street, everything that he saw or knew, and everything that he should, in the exercise of ordinary care, have seen or known, and determine just what he did, and just what happened, and determine whether he was exercising at the time such care as men of ordinary care and prudence would exercise under the same and similar circumstances, and, if you find he was not, then you will find that he was in the exercise of ordinary care in answer to this question." It is very obvious that the use of the word "not," which made the portion excepted to read "and, if you find he was not in the exercise of ordinary care," was clearly a slip in the use of the word "not" which the learned trial judge did not intend, and must have been so understood by the jury. This we think would be apparent to any juror of average intelligence from the connection in which the word "not" was used, as well as viewing the portion of the charge excepted to together with the balance of the charge. Besides it will be seen that, taking this portion of the charge in its literal sense, it was more favorable to the appellant than if the word "not" had been omitted. A case in point is Binns v. State, 66 Ind. 428. Without further pursuing the subject, we are of opinion that there was no prejudicial error in the charge. Hoffman v. Rib Lake Lumber Co. (Wis.) 117 N. W. 789; Lipsky v. C. Reiss Coal Co. (Wis.) 117 N. W. 805; Kiekhoefer v. Hidershide, 113 Wis. 288, 89 N. W. 189; Pelton v. Spider Lake Sawmill & Lumber Co. 132 Wis. 219, 112 N. W. 29; Twentieth Century Co. v. Quilling (Wis.) 117 N. W. 1007.

3. It is also contended that the damages, $1,200, awarded, are excessive. We would be better satisfied, upon the facts of the case as disclosed by the evidence, with a smaller verdict. The court below refused to disturb the verdict, and the question arises whether we can reverse it, because a new trial was not granted on account of excessive damages. It is true the actual expenses incurred by the plaintiff in consequence of the injury were small, the appellant paying the doctor's bill. The plaintiff is about sixty-three years of age, and the injuries did not at first appear to be of a serious character. The principal injuries complained of were to the head and hip. The evidence of the doctors who examined him is quite strong to the effect that they were unable to find any physical injury to the hip, and were obliged to rely upon plaintiff's statements, conduct, and behavior, nothing being observable of any consequence except a scalp wound, which healed in a short time. There is evidence, however, tending to show that the machine was going 8 or 9 miles an hour; that plaintiff, when struck, was knocked down and rendered unconscious; that he had not at the time of trial recovered from the injuries, was unable to work, and suffered considerable pain; did not rest 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) well for three weeks after the injury; was earning $1.50 per day when injured in July, and the case was tried in December, 1907. One doctor who made an examination two months before the trial found tenderness in the scalp wound, also soreness in hip, which he thought would be permanent, and that the injuries complained of could have been received without leaving any external evidence of them; that the conditions he found came from the injuries received when struck by the car; that the result of an operation for relief of the scalp injury would be uncertain, and that plaintiff's head was permanently injured, and soreness continued in the hip and back. From a careful examination of the evidence we do not feel that this court would be justified in holding that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive. Duffy v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 34 Wis. 188; Donovan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 93 Wis. 373, 67 N. W. 721, and cases cited. It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

PATRICK F. DORAN

v.

HUGO A. THOMSEN, Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 71 Atl. 296.)

Master — daughter as servant — automobile.

1. Where a father was possessed of an automobile which he kept upon his premises, and his daughter, about nineteen years of age, was accustomed to drive it, and did so whenever she felt like it, asking permission to use it when the father was at home, but when not at home took it sometimes without permission, there being no proof that the daughter was actually employed by the father to operate the machine,—Held, in an action against the father, where the daughter, in using the machine for her own pleasure in driving her personal friends, negligently injured a person in the highway, that such proof was not sufficient to constitute the daughter the servant or agent of the master; and that a motion for a direction of a verdict for the defendant should have prevailed.

and daughter, yet it does not appear in this case that on the occasion in question she was acting as such servant within the scope of her employment. That the master is responsible for the negligence of his servant when acting within the scope of his employment is elementary law, but that he is not responsible if the negligence was committed by the servant when engaged in some private matter of his own is equally elementary. These two propositions are well stated in two New York cases. King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37, where the court spoke as follows: "Where one person has sustained an injury from the negligence of another, he must, in general, proceed against him by whose negligence the injury was occasioned. If, however, the negligence which caused the injury was that of a servant while engaged in his master's business, the person sustaining the injury may disregard the immediate author of the mischief, and hold the master responsible for the damages sustained." In Wyllie v. Palmer, 137 N. Y. 248, 19 L.R.A. 285, 33 N. E. 381, the court said: "The doctrine of respondere superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged for the result of some neglect or wrong at the time and in respect to the very transaction out of which the injury arose." In Holler v. Ross, 68 N. J. L. 324, 59 L.R.A. 943, 96 Am. St. Rep. 546, 53 Atl. 472, Mr. Justice Fort, speaking for this court, says: "The servant of the master cannot bind the master to respond in damages to the plaintiff unless it be shown that the act which the servant did which caused the injury was an act which was expressly or by necessary implication within the line of his duty under his employment." We have seen that there was no express authority for the daughter to take the vehicle on the occasion of the accident, nor can we perceive that, by necessary implication, her use of it for her own purposes was within the line of her duty under her assumed implied employment. In Evers v. Krouse, 70 N. J. L. 653, 66 L.R.A. 592, 58 Atl. 181, the case last cited received again the approval of this court; and it was further stated that "an act done by the servant while engaged in the work of his master may be entirely disconnected therefrom, done not as a means or for the purpose of performing that work, but solely for the accomplishment of the independent . . . purpose of the servant. Such an act is not, as a matter of fact, the act of the master in any sense, and should not be deemed to be so as a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

matter of law. As to it, the relation of master and servant does not exist between the parties, and for the injury resulting to a third person from it the servant alone should be held responsible." In that case the defendant's son had been intrusted with a garden hose with which to sprinkle his father's lawn, and, while so engaged, deliberately turned the water upon a horse, frightening him, causing the injury complained of and for which the father had been sued. The court then said: "The fact that he [the son] used the tool supplied to him for the doing of his father's work for the accomplishment of his own mischievous purpose did not make it an act within the scope of his employment, and did not render the defendant liable for the injury resulting therefrom." While in that case the act was malicious, yet an act not malicious is within the enunciated principle, if such act is not expressly or by necessary implication within the scope of duty, and with regard to which it cannot be said that the servant was engaged in the performance of the act for the other. The act must be done for the purpose of executing the master's orders and doing his work and while actually engaged in serving the master; and it is not enough to say that the injuries complained of would not have been committed without the facilities afforded by the servant's relations to his master. Garretzen v. Duenckel, 50 Mo. 104, 11 Am. Rep. 405; Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49. For a clear exposition of this principle, see Morier v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Minn. 351, 47 Am. Rep. 793, 17 N. W. 952. The following are some recent authorities on this subject with special relation to automobiles; Stewart v. Baruch, 103 App. Div. 577, 93 N. Y. Supp. 161; Clark v. Buckmobile Co. 107 App. Div. 120, 94 N. Y. Supp. 771; Reynolds v. Buck, 127 Iowa, 601, 103 N. W. 946; Quigley v. Thompson, 211 Pa. 107, 60 Atl. 506; Patterson v. Kates (C. C.) 152 Fed. 481; Slatter v. Advance Thresher Co. 97 Minn. 305, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 598, 107 N. W. 133; Evans v. Dyke Automobile Supply Co. 121 Mo. App. 266, 101 S. W. 1132; Lotz v. Hanlon, 217 Pa. 339, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 202, 118 Am. St. Rep. 922, 66 Atl. 525, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 731; Lewis v. Amorous, 3 Ga. App. 50, 59 S. E. 338; Jones v. Hoge, 47 Wash. 663, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 92 Pac. 433.

Undoubtedly liability might be visited upon the father, but upon quite different grounds. If the machine had been bought for his children's use, and it was in its nature or use a menace to the safety of others, then, under the theory illustrated in Van Winkle v. American Steam Boiler Co.

52 N. J. L. 240, 19 Atl. 472, it might well be that liability would arise by reason of the father's intrusting a dangerous machine or agency to the hands of an inexperienced or incompetent person. Such a liability does not rest upon the negligence of the servant, but upon the father's negligence in permitting his child to use a dangerous machine. In the one the gist of the action is the negligence of the servant imputed to the master; in the other, the negligence of the father. This distinction is thus stated in 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1665: "The mere relation of parent and child imposes upon the parent no liability for the torts of the child committed without his knowledge or authority, express or implied; and although, when a parent authorizes the child to act as his agent or servant in any matter, he is liable for the torts of the child committed in the course of the employment, this liability does not grow out of the relation of parent and child, but is based upon the relation of principal and agent or master and servant, and is governed by the rules applicable to such relations. So, also, while a parent may be liable for an injury which is directly caused, by the child, where his negligence has made it possible for the child to cause the injury complained of, and probable that the child would do so, this liability is based upon the rules of negligence rather than the relation of parent and child." We are not at liberty to consider this possible liability, for there could not be any finding of fact against the defendant to this effect; it appearing from the bills of exception that the trial judge excluded from the consideration of the jury that question of fact by his instruction that, unless there was agency, there was no liability. Fielders v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 68 N. J. L. 343, 59 L.R.A. 455, 96 Am. St. Rep. 552, 53 Atl. 404, 54 Atl. 822. It was therefore error to refuse to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error has also been assigned upon exception taken to the charge. The defendant requested the court to charge: "If, at the time of the accident, Miss Thomsen was using the machine for her own pleasure, and without reference to the defendant's business, then there must be a verdict for the defendant." This the court refused, and instead charged: "When you come to consider the defendant's business, . . . it is the business for which he bought this machine; that is, the business of the defendant. . . . It was the particular business for which he bought this machine. Was this servant engaged in operating that machine for the purpose for which her father bought it? Was she operating it for her own pleasure in the way 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that she has testified to? If she took that machine out at that time in pursuance of a general authority of her father to take it whenever she pleased for the pleasure of the family and for her own pleasure, for the purpose for which the master bought it, for the purpose for which her father owned it, for the purpose for which he expected her to operate it, then she was the servant of the father. Under those circumstances, that was the business for which the father bought the machine. If she did not have this general authority from her father, if she took this machine out for her own recreation, amusement, and pleasure, contrary to the authority of her father, and this accident occurred, while she may be liable, the father is not. I charge the sixth request to charge with the qualification which I have stated to the jury." This makes the defendant's liability to depend upon the object for which he purchased the machine, which was for the pleasure of the family, in connection with the fact that his daughter operated it for that purpose, the jury being instructed that thereby she became his servant. This is contrary to the doctrine of Evers v. Krouse, 70 N. J. L. 653, 66 L.R.A. 592, 53 Atl. 181. It would subject a parent to liability if he bought for his son a baseball or for his daughter a golf club, and, by permitting them to be used by his children for their appropriate purposes, injury occurred. It bases the creation of the relation of master and servant upon the purpose which the parent had in mind in acquiring ownership of the vehicle and its permissive use by the child. This proposition ignores an essential element in the creation of that status as to third persons, that such use must be in furtherance of, and not apart from, the master's service and control, and fails to distinguish between a mere permission to use and a use subject to the control of the master and connected with his affairs. The reason for liability is founded upon the idea of control which a master has over his servant. The court, although attempting to rest the liability upon the relation of master and servant, yet actually tested the liability by the fact that she was intrusted with the operation of the machine for her own pleasure, if purchased for that object, whereby she ipso facto became a servant. So that the charge thus in fact left the legal relationship of master and servant out of account, and raised it in name only because the daughter was allowed to drive the machine. In this there was also error.

The judgment must be reversed and a venire de novo awarded.

DONATO CITRONE, Resp't.,
v.
O'ROURKE ENGINEERING CONSTRUCTION COMPANY, Appt.

(188 N. Y. 339, 80 N. E. 1092.)

Master and servant—safe place to work—prosecution of work.

The common-law doctrine of the duty of the master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work, which cannot be devolved upon a fellow servant so as to relieve the master, does not apply in favor of a member of a gang of workmen whose duty it was to enter a portion of a trench in course of construction after a blast had been fired by a preceding gang, and assist in removing broken stone, who was injured by the fall of some loose earth from the sides of the trench.

(April 30, 1907.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming, by a divided court, a judgment for plaintiff after a jury trial at a trial term for Richmond County in an action by an employee against an employer to recover damages for personal injuries. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

I. Introductory.

In examining the question of the servant's assumption of risk so far as the fact that the conditions of the working place are changing as the work goes on bears upon it, cases which might be in point as to the facts, but which turn upon grounds that would apply as well to fixed conditions of the working place are excluded, as they can throw no light upon the subject.

The rule relating to changing conditions of the working place forms an exception 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Theodore H. Lord, with Messrs. Rollins & Rollins, for appellant:

The trench was not a place to work, furnished by the defendant.

Mr. Thomas J. O'Neill, for respondent:

The respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence, nor were his injuries caused by any risk which he assumed.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment which comes before us for review on this appeal is based upon the alleged negligence of the defendant corporation in failing to provide the plaintiff, who was a laborer in its service, with a reasonably safe place wherein to do the work to the safe-place rule, and is stated by Labatt on Master & Servant, § 269, to be: "The rule that it is the duty of a master to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place . . . for his servants is held not to be applicable to cases in which the very work which the servants are employed to do is of such a nature that its progress is constantly changing the conditions as regards an increase or diminution of safety. The hazards thus arising as the work proceeds are regarded as being the ordinary dangers of the employment, and, by his acceptance of the employment, the servant necessarily assumes them." This doctrine, said the court in Schneider v. Philadelphia Quartz Co. 220 Pa. 548, 69 Atl. 1035, resulted from the fact that the prosecution of the work made the place dangerous, but it was not the master's duty in such case to follow up the servants every moment to see that they made the place safe.

The decisions upon this subject are harmonious, and of late this exception has been interposed quite frequently against the servant's demand for damages. The reason for relaxing the rule in such cases is that it is more than the master can do to keep a changing working place safe from transient, shifting hazards which spring up only as the work advances. The servant is supposed to know this. He therefore assumes the risk when he goes to work. It is sometimes said in these cases that the servant has a better chance to become aware of the fleet-which he was employed to perform. That work, considered as a whole, was the construction of a trench through earth and rock in the city of New York. It was prosecuted, first, by blasting, and, secondly, by the removal of the blasted material. The plaintiff does not appear to have had anything to do with the blasting, but he and the gang of workmen to which he belonged would enter the portion of the trench already open after a blast had been fired and assist in removing the broken stone, sometimes breaking it up into smaller pieces to facilitate the process of removal. While engaged in this employment on September 13, 1904, he was injured by the fall upon him of some loose stones and earth from the sides of the trench. A small blast had previously been fired immediately before he began to work, about two hours earlier on the same morning.

The theory of the plaintiff's case, as presented to the jury, was that the defendant was negligent in not protecting him and his fellow laborers against such an accident as that which befell him, which could have been done by shoring or bracing up the sides of the trench so far as it had already been opened. At the place where the accident occurred the trench was about 14 feet deep and 6 or 7 feet wide, and was being cut mostly through rock. There was shoring on the sides to the height of 5 or 6 feet from the bottom, but no further up. The question which the learned trial judge left to the jury on this branch of the case was thus stated in his charge: "Was this trench made reasonably safe for such work, considering the character of the work, which was necessarily dangerous? In other words, was this trench where the plaintiff was employed made as safe as a trench where the work of excavating and blasting is carried on ordinarily is made by ordinarily prudent men?" The jury must have answered these questions in the negative in order to find the verdict which they rendered in favor of the plaintiff; for they were expressly instructed by the court that they could not hold the defendant liable either for a failure to provide competent workmen to perform the work, or for a failure to provide proper tools or appliances with which the work was to be done.

It was the contention of counsel for the defendant on the trial, and he contends here, that, under the circumstances disclosed by the uncontradicted evidence, the doctrine of the duty of a master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work in has no application to the case at bar. This point is distinctly raised by proper exceptions, and, if well taken, is fatal to the judgment. In my opinion it is well taken.

ing dangers that threaten him than the master, and that the servant therefore assumes the risk of injury therefrom.

In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown, 20 C. C. A. 147, 34 U. S. App. 759, 73 Fed. 970, the court said that it was the master's duty to provide for his servants a safe place in which to work, but that manifestly that principle was not applicable to a case in which the place became dangerous during the progress of the work, either necessarily or from the manner in which the work was done.

But the fact that an injured employee was working in a place in which the conditions were constantly changing was held to be a matter of defense, and not of demurrer, in Black v. Virginia Portland Cement Co. 104 Va. 450, 51 S. E. 831.

In American Bridge Co. v. Seeds, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041, 75 C. C. A. 407, 144 Fed. 605, the court said that the positive duty of the master did not extend to keeping a place safe where the servant's work necessarily changed its character as to safety as the work progressed; but that the duty to care for the safety of the place in such cases devolved upon the servants to whom the work was entrusted.

While, as a general rule, it is the duty of a master to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe working place, this rule cannot be applied to cases in which the very work in which the servant is engaged changes the character of the place 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for safety as the work progresses. When the servant's work makes the working place hazardous from time to time, the hazard of such temporary danger becomes a risk of the business. Fortin v. Manville Co. 128 Fed. 642.

In Montgomery v. Robertson, 229 Ill. 466, 82 N. E. 396, the court said that an exception to the safe-place rule universally recognized was that the general rule did not apply where the conditions were changing from time to time during the prosecution of the work. If the nature of the work was such as to produce changes and temporary conditions in the place where the work was performed, the rule itself did not require the master to keep the place reasonably safe under such changed conditions which the work rendered necessary.

The master is not bound to protect his servant against mere transitory perils that the execution of the work occasions. Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 168 Ind. 671, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529.

In Bloomfield v. Worster Constr. Co. 118 Mo. App. 254, 94 S. W. 304, the court said that, generally speaking, it was the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care to furnish his servant a reasonably safe working place, where, by exercising ordinary care, the latter could perform the labors assigned with a reasonable degree of safety to himself, subject only to the risks ordinarily incident to the employment. But this well-settled rule had an equally well-settled

The evidence clearly shows that the work to be done was the construction of the trench. The learned trial judge so instructed the jury. As I have already pointed out, this work of construction was twofold in character, and consisted of the blasting followed by the removal of the material. The gang of workmen to which the plaintiff belonged were fellow servants with those engaged in the blasting. Precisely what that gang did appears from the testimony of another witness who belonged to it. "After a blast," he said, "we would be sent to clean out the stone that had been loosened by the blast. Wherever the stone fell after the blast was the place to which we went to clean it out. That is the way we were working. That is the kind of work that all the men in that gang were doing, and some of them were breaking stone and some of them putting them up. He [the plaintiff] was working removing the stone that had been thrown out by some blast. He was there where they had blasted and we were cleaning it out. Immediately after the blast some of them would lift the stone from one bank to another and others would load cars. They would get these stones from down in the ditch wherever there was blasting." It is apparent from this and all the other evidence in the case relating to the character of the work and the manner in which it was being conducted that, whatever was the danger to which the men were exposed, it was due to the manner in which the work was prosecuted. The degree of safety near the head of the trench was constantly subject to change as the trench was extended. Under such circumstances, the rule of law which makes it incumbent upon an employer to provide or maintain a safe place in which his employees are to do their work has no application. As was said by Mr. Justice Cullen in O'Connell v. Clark, 22 App. Div. 466, 48 N. Y. Supp. 74, "the principle of a safe place does not apply where the prosecution of the work itself makes the place and creates its danger;" and by the same judge in Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 9 App. Div. 129, 41 N. Y. Supp. 128: "The rule that the master must provide a safe place for work only applies where the work and the place are not connected, where the work is not in the construction of the place as in the case of a mill, a factory, mine, ship, well, etc." All those engaged in the master's service in effecting a common purpose are to be deemed fellow servants, exception, and that was that the master was not required to furnish the servant a safe place in which to work when the danger was temporary and transitory only and arose from the hazard and nature of the work itself and was known to the servant. What was termed an exception to the rule of safe place, however, amounted to nothing more than the doctrine that the servant assumed the risks ordinarily incident to the employment, inasmuch as the rule of safe place was abrogated thereby only as to such risks as arose from the nature and hazard of the work, and were therefore ordinarily incident, etc.

In Kath v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 121 Wis. 503, 99 N. W. 217, the court, in holding that it was not necessary for the master to give warning of the dangerous condition of a burning bridge to an engineer and fireman who were sent to assist in putting out the fire, since they assumed all the risks that might ordinarily be expected to be present because of the weakening of the bridge by the fire, said that the place to work was being changed constantly, and was necessarily incomplete and dangerous; that the employees knew it, and accepted such risks as were ordinarily present in such operations.

It is not enough, however, that the place was safe when the work was commenced, and that it became unsafe as the work progressed owing to the method of doing it, where the work was commenced several weeks before the injured servant was employed. The place must be made safe at the time he is himself set to work. When a new servant is hired, new duties are cast upon the master with reference to him, for the master is bound to furnish him a safe place when he puts him to work. Simone v. Kirk, 173 N. Y. 7, 65 N. E. 739, reversing 57 App. Div. 461, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1019.

For duty of master to furnish safe appliances as affected by the fact that the defective appliances were prepared by fellow servants, see note to Haskell v. Cape Ann Anchor Works, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 220.

II. Work of construction or demolition.

a. In general.

The doctrine that the safe-place rule does not apply where the conditions of the working place are constantly changing is now being frequently invoked in construction cases, which have heretofore been excepted from the operation of that rule on other grounds.

So it was held that, where men were engaged in blasting, a ledge of rock for the construction of a right of way, the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place for his workmen was not so continuous, that in every change in the surface of the ledge of rock, whether by blasting or by shoveling off the crushed stones, the master's duty of furnishing a safe place at once attached. Perry v. Rogers, 157 N. Y. 251, 51 N. E. 1021. The court said that it had not been understood to be the rule in New York that, in the performance of work of such character, the master, after making the place in the first instance reasonably safe for the prosecution of the notwithstanding the fact that the work is done in successive stages, different parts thereof being devolved upon different persons, and the labor performed by one set of employees being prior in time to that performed by another set. Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 146, 42 Am. Rep. 240. See, also, McGuire v. Bell Teleph. Co. 167 N. Y. 208, 215, 52 L.R.A. 437, 60 N. E. 433; Neagle v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 185 N. Y. 270, 77 N. E. 1064. If, therefore, the accident to the plaintiff was due to the carelessness of those who did the blasting, this was the negligence of his fellow servants for which the master could not be held responsible at common law; and the trial court ruled that the plaintiff was not entitled to go to the jury under the employers' liability act, though for what reason does not appear.

The learned counsel for the respondent relies largely upon Kranz v. Long Island R. Co. 123 N. Y. 1, 20 Am. St. Rep. 716, 25 N. E. 206, as an authority for the application of the doctrine of a safe place to the case at bar; but in the Kranz Case and the other trench cases in which that doctrine has been held applicable the person injured had nothing to do with the preparation of the trench in which the accident occurred. It was prepared, not by him, but for him long before he began work therein, and that work constituted no part of the construction of the trench itself. See Schmit v. Gillen, 41 App. Div. 302, 58 N. Y. Supp. 458. In the present case, however, the plaintiff was engaged in the removal of material the removal of which was just as essential to the construction of the trench as was the preliminary blasting.

The opinions in the appellate division were devoted chiefly to the consideration of another and very interesting question relating to the plaintiff's assumption of risk, growing out of the decision of this court in the case of Rice v. Eureka Paper Co. 174 N. Y. 385, 62 L.R.A. 611, 95 Am. St. Rep. 585, 66 N. E. 979; but it is not necessary to consider that question now if the foregoing views are correct, as they suffice to require a reversal of the judgment and a new trial, with costs to abide the event.

work, had any duty to perform other than to furnish safe appliances and to hire competent and skillful employees.

A workman, in tearing down a scaffold, assumes the risk of its falling, where the dangerous condition of the structure is occasioned by the work of its own destruction, which is performed by the servant and his fellow laborers in a manner that necessarily increases the danger to themselves as the work progresses. Richards v. Riverside Iron Works, 56 W. Va. 510, 49 S. E. 437.

A carpenter engaged in the work of building a battle ship assumes the risk of an iron plate falling upon him while the plate is being hoisted to its place on the vessel, and therefore cannot recover for a resulting injury on the theory that the master has failed to furnish a safe working place, since the servant, in such a case, is in a better position to know of the danger of the situation than the master. Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. 39 Wash. 631, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 283, 109 Am. St. Rep. 917, 81 Pac. 1089. The court said that the servant's work was constantly being changed from place to place in removing or adjusting the shores about the ship. The particular place where the accident happened was rendered unsafe only at the moment when they began to elevate the heavy plate. The entire situation might have been thoroughly inspected and found safe a minute before, so far as the evidence showed. The master was under no obligation to have an officer constantly follow the servant around to protect him from situations made dangerous by occurrences unusual and unexpected by either master or servant. The very nature of the work of building a ship necessitated constant changes. A place perfectly safe one minute might become extremely dangerous the next by the ordinary and necessary operation of the work and without fault on the part of anyone. A servant working in the capacity of the plaintiff knew all this, and must be held to be to a certain extent his own inspector. He could not complain because the master, with less opportunity than he, had failed in a given instance to detect or anticipate an unexpected occurrence.

The safe-place rule does not apply to the construction of a breakwater so as to render the master liable for injury to a laborer due to the breaking of a cap on a bent of a temporary trestle. Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017. The court said that "manifestly the place in which the work was to be done was not provided by the defendant, nor could it be said that different portions of the work in which the laborers might be engaged as it progressed was the 'place' furnished by their employer," within the meaning of the safe-place rule. On the contrary, the making of the bent was a part of the work to be done by the laborers themselves in the construction of the jetty.

But the fact that the servants day by day, as they carried off coal from beneath an unsafe trestle, progressed from one timber to another of the trestle, does not in any respect change the condition of the place of work so as to relieve the master from liability for an injury caused by the falling of an insecurely fastened timber. Nix v. C.

Master and servant — safe place to work — changing conditions.

1. The common-law doctrine of the duty of the master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work, which cannot be devolved upon a fellow servant so as to relieve the master, does not apply in favor of an employee injured while engaged with fellow servants under a competent foreman in a detail of the work of removing a bank of earth and gravel, by the fall of an overhanging ledge, which was the condition on the day of the accident, and not a condition that had previously existed.

Same — failure to furnish explosives.

2. A master cannot be charged with liability for injuries to a servant from the fall of an overhanging ledge, a changing condition in the work of removing a bank of earth and gravel, upon the ground that he did not supply the foreman with explosives for the removal of ledges, where it is not shown that there was any demand for explosives, or that they were deemed by the foreman to be necessary, or that the means at hand were ineffectual for the purpose.

(April 30, 1907.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon verdict of a jury at a trial term for Oneida County in an action by an employee against his employer to recover damages for personal injuries. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Diven & Diven, for appellant: The alleged negligence of the defendant in failing to supply explosives was not the proximate cause of the accident.

Hofnagle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 608.

The foreman was a fellow servant of the plaintiff.

Loughlin v. State, 105 N. Y. 159. 11 N. E. 371.

Mr. Albert T. Wilkinson, with Messrs. Davies, Johnson, & Wilkinson, for respondent:

Defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 81 N.

Reiss Coal Co. 114 Wis. 493, 90 N. W. 437. The court said that, had the business of the men been the tearing down of such a structure, it might have been claimed that the weakening of the portions of the structure still standing, resulting from previous work, was a condition which they themselves had created and changed, and which therefore must be held to have been within their knowledge as fully as within that of their employer. It would be as reasonable to contend that a painter progressing upward on a ladder and injured by reason of a defective rung changed and therefore created the conditions of his work because he had gradually progressed upward toward the defect.

b. Railroads.

Some of the railroad-construction cases are ruled against the servant on the ground that he is employed in making the place safe, and that he cannot therefore expect it to be safe, and some upon the general ground that construction cases form an exception to the safe-place rule. In a few of the decisions, however, the changing conditions of the working place are recognized, and are relied on as the reason for holding the master not responsible.

In Walling v. Congaree Constr. Co. 41 S. C. 388, 19 S. E. 723, it was pointed out that there is a distinction between a defective track and roadbed on a completed railroad, and one in process of construction, so far as liability of the master for injury to a servant caused thereby is concerned. In 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that case an employee of a construction company was killed by the derailment of a construction train, and the court said: "We have not been able to find a case precisely in point as to the liability of a construction company for accidents occurring while constructing a railroad; but it would seem that, on principle, there must be a difference, especially as to maintaining a safe roadbed, between a railroad company already in operation and a construction company having no finished road of their own, and running no cars but a material train, engaged in the very work of constructing the road; which, in the process of construction, necessarily changes its condition every day, and, therefore, at no particular time can that condition possibly be known either to the company or their employees."

A servant engaged in the work of removing a railroad trestle assumes the risk of its falling. Grayson-McLeod Lumber Co. v. Carter, 76 Ark. 69, 88 S. W. 597. The court said that there was no duty in such a case to furnish the servant a safe place in which to work, since his employment made it his duty to tear down and to change and destroy his places of work, and to make them safe or unsafe as his work rendered them; and was such as to place it out of the power of his employer to perform such duty.

A member of a construction gang engaged in bolting angle irons on the ends of rails assumes the risk of injury caused by a rail flying up and striking his hand as the construction train passes over a tie that is a Defendant was also negligent, apart from the question of tools and appliances, in not furnishing the plaintiff a safe place to work, and in failing to warn him of the danger.

Simone v. Kirk, 173 N. Y. 13, 65 N. E. 739.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injuries, because of which the plaintiff has brought this action, were sustained while in the defendant's employment, and under the following circumstances: The defendant was operating a steam shovel for the removal of gravel and earth from a bank on one side of its main track. The car containing the shovel and its machinery was upon a temporary track, laid between the bank and the railway, and the work was in charge of a foreman, who, so far as it appears, was competent. The plaintiff came upon the work while it was in progress and four days before meeting with his accident. His duty was to attend to one of the four jackscrews, which were placed under each corner of the shovel car, and which served to keep it steady while the shovel was in motion. At the place where the accident occurred, the bank was about 21 feet in height, sloped gradually from the top, and was composed of a thick layer of hard clay above, with loose earth, or gravel, below. When the bank was shoveled away, as far as the reach of the shovel ahead permitted, the temporary track was shifted on, and the shovel car moved forward. In that way, the situation changed from day to day at the rate of some 20 feet. Just prior to the accident, the plaintiff was directed by the foreman to attend to his jackscrew, which was upon the side of the shovel car next to the bank. He had tightened up his screw, and was gathering up his "blocking," when suddenly the bank caved in and a part of the overhanging top fell upon him. The plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant, which was affirmed by the appellate division by a divided vote.

Negligence is, generally, charged against the defendant for the failure to furnish a safe place for the plaintiff to work in, and suitable tools and appliances for doing the work of excavation. Particularly, it is insisted that the defendant was neglectful of the duty to furnish explosives, with which to break off, or to prevent, overhanging little higher than the others. Meehan v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 114 Mo. App. 396, 90 S. W. 102. The court said that the duty of a master to furnish a servant a reasonably safe place in which to work applied with all its rigor only where the place and its conditions had some permanency, and were unshifting. It did not apply where the place was constantly undergoing a change by the very work the servant was engaged in performing, nor where the work required a repeated and continuous change of the servant's place of work, as in the work of attaching angle bars to steel rails on a railroad track under construction. When the rule did not apply, the duty of a master to a servant was fully discharged if he did not place the servant in a discovered position of peril, or in one that might have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care, which peril was not incident to the business or its duties.

Permitting ties or other obstructions to remain in the way of men who are engaged in dismantling an old railroad track, so that one of the members of the gang who is carrying a steel rail stumbles and falls, causing the rail to strike and injure plaintiff, is not negligence for which the master can be charged. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jackson, 12 C. C. A. 507, 27 U. S. App. 519, 65 Fed. 48. The court, in referring to the plaintiff, who was one of the men engaged in the work, said that he certainly had no reason to suppose that the right of way where he would have occasion to work would be kept free at every moment from all such impediments as might cause a man to lose his footing; nor could it be said, in view of the character of the work in which the plaintiff was engaged, that it was the duty of the defendant to keep its right of way at all times free from obstructions. In so far as the injury complained of was occasioned by defects in the place where plaintiff was required to work, it must be attributed to one of the ordinary risks of the service in which he was engaged, and which he impliedly assumed when he became engaged in such service.

A servant employed in dismantling a railroad trestle assumes the risk of stepping on an unsecured timber causing him to be thrown to the ground, since it is an ordinary and apparent risk necessarily incident to the work. Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 167 Pa. 495, 31 Atl. 734.

A railroad company is not required to block a frog during the progress of the construction of the road; and the only duty which the company owes to a brakeman on a freight train is to give him such notice and warning as will put him on his guard against the dangers incident to the use of the track while the work is in progress. Hauss v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 40 C. C. A. 94, 105 Fed. 733.

It must not be taken for granted, however, that the mere fact that the working place is unfinished absolves the master from all responsibility as to its safety, or from all liability for negligence in relation thereto. The reason for making an exception to the safe-place rule under such circumstances being that the changing conditions render it impracticable, if not impossible, ledges; and the case was submitted to the jury upon that theory. The jurors were told, in effect, that the plaintiff's case depended upon the evidence establishing that the accident was the result of the lack of explosives. This was not a case for the application of the rule that the master must furnish a reasonably safe place. The place where the men were to work changed from day to day, as the steam shovel moved on in its operations. It was, necessarily, such as the conformation of the embankment and the process of excavation made it. The kind of work which the men were employed to do was such as to make the possibility of a fall of earth an ever present one, and called for the exercise of active vigilance to guard against their being involved in it. The situation was one which made it the duty of the foreman to watch each supervening condition during the progress of the work, and to warn the men. They were not excused themselves, of course, from being vigilant to observe conditions. The master's liability in this case is determined by common-law rules, and is not predicated upon statute. If the defendant set the men at work under a competent foreman and with suitable appliances, it had performed its duty towards them, and the execution of the details of the work could properly be intrusted to the judgment of the foreman. For his negligence, or for his mistakes in judgment, as to such, it could not be made liable for injurious results.

Now, with respect to the claim that the defendant is liable because of its failure to furnish explosives with the other tools and appliances in the car, it is clear that can only be a tenable one, provided the evidence disclosed that an emergency arose when it was judged that they were necessary and they could not be had. Experts were examined to show that explosives were used in certain cases to break away overhanging ledges, and there was evidence that, at some time previously, the foreman had spoken of sending for dynamite. It may be assumed that, in this case, the use of explosives might have been efficient; but it was not shown that the foreman would have used them upon the occasion in question, and it for the master to keep the place reasonably safe, it would seem that the duty to keep the place safe would remain in so far as it would be practicable for the master to fulfil it. A few illustrative cases will indicate this limitation.

A servant, in passing to and from his work over newly constructed pieces of road, assumes greater risks than would another servant whose duty takes him back and forth over the same line of track after its full completion and equipment for passengers; but such a servant has an undoubted right to expect a degree of care and skill equal to that ordinarily exercised during the progress of railroad construction. Colorado Midland R. Co. v. Naylor, 17 Colo. 501, 31 Am. St. Rep. 335, 30 Pac. 249.

In Van Amburg v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 37 La. Ann. 650, 55 Am. Rep. 517, the court said that, although a bridge, for construction purposes, was not required to be as solid and complete as for traffic, when heavy trains must pass over it, it was necessary that it should be solid and complete enough to make it safe. No company had any right to trifle with the lives of its employees, nor to put them in greater peril than was incident to the nature of their employment.

A constructing engineer, in riding over a new and partially completed roadbed and unballasted track, does not assume risks which are the result of running trains at an unreasonably high rate of speed over a track in a bad and dangerous condition. Meloy v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 743, 4 L.R.A. 287, 14 Am. St. Rep. 325, 42 N. W. 563.

Whether or not the failure of the master to provide a target for a switch on a railroad in process of construction is a neglect of duty owed to his employees is a question for the jury. Bennett v. Long Island R. Co. 21 App. Div. 25, 47 N. Y. Supp. 258.

c. Buildings.

The safe-place rule does not apply to servants at work on buildings in course of erection which are undergoing constant changes in passing through successive temporary conditions, many of which must, from the very necessity of construction, be dangerous, the hazards involved being incident to the employment and hence assumed by the servant. Richardson v. Anglo-American Provision Co. 72 Ill. App. 77. To the same effect is McNeill v. Bottsford-Dickinson Co. 128 App. Div. 544, 112 N. Y. Supp. 867.

Nor does the rule apply where a servant is employed in the demolition of a building, since the work of removal is one in which each part of the structure in turn is rendered insecure, which every workman understands. Clark v. Liston, 54 Ill. App. 578.

In Kreigh v. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684, 81 C. C. A. 338, 162 Fed. 120, in holding that a foreman in charge of the brickwork of a building in process of construction, who, while superintending the construction of a scaffold, was knocked off a plank by a cement bucket which was being lowered by roofers by means of a derrick, could not maintain an action against the master for a resulting injury, on the theory of the master's failure to establish a system of signals to be used by the roofers to warn employees when the bucket was to cross the wall, and of his failure to provide the derrick with a lever, or the boom with a guy rope to steady and control its movements,—the court said that the

was not shown that there was any demand for them, or that they were deemed by him to be necessary. There were picks, bars, and other tools; but there was no attempt to use them to pry off the top of the bank, then, or at any other time, as was shown to be a usual method. If they had been used, and had proved ineffectual for the purpose, it might then be claimed, with some force, that the men were inadequately provided with appliances. It was necessary, before the defendant could be charged with a neglect of duty, to show that efforts to change, or to improve, the situation had been rendered abortive through the insufficient supply of the means to meet it. There was nothing to show this to have been the case, and, if the occurrence is attributable to the omission of the foreman to make use of the tools at hand, or to procure further appliances, the fault was that of a fellow servant, and not of the defendant. A jury's speculation upon the situation cannot be allowed to affect the question of the master's liability. The performance of the work was committed to the foreman's supervision and judgment, and there is no complaint of his lack of skill. If he chose to operate his shovel solely upon the bank, when a better judgment would advise the resort to additional methods for breaking it down, the fault was his, and not that of the defendant. If he failed to be watchful, and omitted to warn the plaintiff seasonably of the peril, again, the latter suffered from the fault of his fellow servant. The thing to be done at the time was a detail of the common work upon which all were engaged. The caving in of the bank was the result of the operation of the shovel. The ledge that fell was the condition of that day, and not a condition that had existed, and the cause of its fall was the removal of the earth beneath.

The case is not within the authority of Simone v. Kirk, 173 N. Y. 7, 65 N. E. 739, which was altogether exceptional in its character. There the laborer was killed by the fall of a projecting mass of material under which he had been directed to work. The condition had existed for several days before he came upon the work. He safe-place rule was inapplicable. The duty of caring for the safety of a place in cases in which the work which the servants were employed to do necessarily changed its character as the work progressed was not the duty of the master, but of the servants to whom the work was intrusted.

A master is not liable for injury to a servant caused by the falling of a truss upon him while at work upon the construction of a building, on the theory that the master has failed to furnish him a safe place in which to work. McElwaine-Richards Co. v. Wall, 166 Ind. 267, 76 N. E. 408. The court said that the work of construction was clearly of such a character as to make it inevitable that, as it progressed, the environment of the servants engaged therein must undergo frequent changes; and that it was not the duty of the master to be continuously present to warn and protect such servants against dangers resulting from these changes.

The obligation of the master to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servants to work on does not impose upon him the duty of keeping a building which they are engaged in erecting in a safe condition at every moment of their work, so far as its safety depends upon the due performance of that work by them and their fellows, so as to render the master liable for injury to a carpenter so employed who steps upon a loose timber and falls. Armour v. Hahn, 111 U. S. 313, 28 L. ed. 440, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433. The court said that, if the timber was, at the time, insecure, it was so either by reason of the risks ordinarily incident to the state of things in the unfinished condition of the building, or else by reason of some negligence of one of the carpenters or bricklayers, all of whom were employed or paid by the same master, and who were working in the course of their employment at the same place and time with an immediate common object, the erection of a building; and therefore, within the strictest limits of the rule of law upon the subject of fellow servants, one of whom could not maintain an action for injuries caused by the negligence of another, against their common master.

In Holloran v. Union Iron & Foundry Co. 133 Mo. 470, 35 S. W. 260, a case in which a servant was working on the construction of a building and fell from a girder while assisting in moving a derrick, the court said that in the course of the erection of a building it was almost impossible to keep it in an absolutely safe condition at every moment of the work. Certain risks were ordinarily incident to the state of things found in the unfinished condition of every building in course of construction. The mechanics and laborers employed and paid to build it were presumed to understand their duties and the risks usually attendant upon them, and, knowing beforehand the methods in use, they assumed the risks usually incident to the discharge of their duties.

A master is not liable for injury to an iron worker employed in the construction of a building, who steps upon a plank which breaks and allows him to fall to the ground, since, for aught that appears, the plank may have been laid by some of the workmen engaged in the building for their own convenience and of their own motion, or may have been a surplus board left over from the construction of scaffolding. Schneider v. American Bridge Co. 31 App. D. C. 420. The court said that the obligation of the master to provide a reasonably safe place did not impose upon him the duty of keeping a building was unacquainted with its condition, and he was sent by the foreman to work under it in the nighttime and with but a dim light. The rule applicable to this case is to be found in the decisions of the cases of Loughlin v. State, 105 N. Y. 159, 11 N. E. 371, Perry v. Rogers, 157 N. Y. 251, 51 N. E. 1021, and Capasso v. Woolfolk, 163 N. Y. 472, 57 N. E. 760. In the last two of these cases the plaintiffs were injured by the falling of stones from the sides of a bank or rock which was being cut down by blasting operations. The judgments recovered by them were reversed by us upon the ground that the removal of these stones was a detail of the work, and the negligence of the foreman in that respect was that of a fellow servant. What were details of the work the master had the right to intrust to a competent foreman, and where the situation was, in the nature of things, a changing one, there was no continuing duty to provide a safe place for the workmen.

If there was negligence in this case, which was the cause of the plaintiff's injuries, it was that of his fellow servant, the foreman, and that was a risk which he assumed when entering upon the employment.

I think that the judgment should be reversed, and that a new trial should be ordered, with costs to abide the event.

which they were employed in erecting in a safe condition at every moment of their work.

The master is not liable for injury to one who walks off of an unprotected platform while engaged in the work of dismantling the master's plant, since the master cannot be required to provide a place safe at all times for workmen who are expressly employed to make it unsafe by tearing down the structure upon which they are at work. Chicago Edison Co. v. Davis, 93 Ill. App. 284.

A master is not liable for injury to a servant caused by the turning or rolling of an iron column temporarily lying upon an unsteady surface near the place where it is to be put in a structure in course of erection, since the obligation of a master to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servants to work upon does not oblige him to keep the building they are employed in erecting in a safe condition at every moment of their work, so far as its safety depends upon the due performance of that work by them and their fellow servants. F. J. McCain Co. v. Kingsley, 126 Ill. App. 165.

Where an I-beam was properly placed on a railroad tie for use in a building in course of construction, and was in a safe condition two days before a steel worker was injured by the slipping of the beam from the tie, it was held that the master was not liable for the injury, since he could not be expected to have every piece of material used in the erection lie in absolute regularity. *Olcott v. The safe-place rule does not apply where a servant engaged in the construction of a building is injured by stepping upon the point of upturned nails protruding through a piece of board lying upon the floor of the building, since this is a mere temporary danger not due to any fault or plan of construction, but arising only during the course of the work, which is of such character that, as it progresses, the environment of the serv-

Statement by Goddard, J.:

These cases were originally brought by the appellants, respectively. The facts being the same in each, they were, by consent, consolidated for trial. The facts are substantially as follows: The Florence & Cripple Creek Railroad Company owns and operates a railway between the towns of Florence and Cripple Creek. A considerable portion of the road is built through a rough, mountainous country, necessitating frequent cuts along the mountain side. In the early afternoon of the 11th of April, 1901, a landslide came down from the mountain side of a cut about 30 feet in height and nearly perpendicular, at a point on the road about 2 miles north of the station of Adelaide, covering the track in what is known as a "thorough cut" for 50 feet in length, and to the depth of 6 or 8 feet, with rock and earth, completely obstructing the passage of trains. John McGrath, who was foreman of the section upon which this slide occurred, with one man, commenced preparation for removing the fallen rock and earth. About 4 P. M. a conductor of a south-bound freight train which was stopped by the obstruction went to Adelaide and telegraphed information of the occurrence to some managing officer. About 5 P. M. Miles McGrath, roadmaster and superintendent of bridges upon defendant's road, then at Florence, in pursuance of an order of the train master of the road, prepared a work train, consisting of flat cars, and started to the place of the slide, gathering up on the way all the employees of the road, among them Timothy J. Maloney and Jackson P. Allen, who were foremen on other sections. This train arrived at the place of the obstruction about 8 P. M. The cars were pushed up to the rock and earth lying in the cut. It was then quite dark, and the only light available was furnished by lanterns and such light as reached the north end of the cut from the headlight of the freight engine, which, by reason of a curve in the track, did not reach the south side of the cut, and by a small bonfire, which lasted but a few minutes. After the arrival of Miles McGrath, no inspection of the mountain side of the cut from which the slide came was made. The conductor of the freight train, when he met Miles McGrath at Adelaide, stated to him that, from what he observed while at the place, he was of the opinion that there was danger of rock falling at the cut. The attention of John McGrath, foreman of the section, and who was in charge of the work, while it was still daylight, was called by Harris, a brakeman on the freight train, to a crevice at the side of the rock on the mountain side, who expressed the opinion that it was dangerous. During the afternoon, John McGrath warned two men not to go through the cut because it was dangerous. Upon arriving at the obstruction, several of the foremen went to Miles McGrath, and one of them, in the presence of the others, asked him if the place had been examined and was all right, whereupon John McGrath, who was also present, said ant must necessarily undergo frequent changes. Armour & Co. v. Dumas, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 36, 95 S. W. 710.

One who is employed to wheel away bricks from a building that is being torn down assumes the risk of being struck by a board which is knocked off by other employees in the course of the work. Walaszewski v. Schoknecht, 127 Wis. 376, 106 N. W. 1070. The court said that in the removal of buildings, as in their erection, the rule that the master must furnish a safe place in which a servant is to work can have but a very limited application. In doing such work new adjustments and changes are continually going on from which danger may arise, against which no forecast can provide or warning be given.

A master is not liable, under the safe-place doctrine, for injuries to a servant engaged in carrying stone across the floor of a building in course of erection, who breaks through a temporary flooring across an elevator shaft and falls down the well, since the contingencies of construction and repair are constantly changing, and it is impossible for employers to foresee all the purposes to which temporary supports may be applied, and to hold them in readiness therefor. Fournier v. Pike, 128 Fed. 921.

An experienced carpenter who is working in a building in process of construction, and who falls through a hole in the floor in the course of the work, cannot recover damages from the master on the theory that he was put to work in an unsafe place, although the master knew of the existence of the hole. Beique v. Hosmer, 169 Mass. 541, 48 N. E. 338. The court said that obviously the condition of such a building was not a permanent one, but was liable to change as the necessities of construction required. An experienced workman must be assumed to know this, and to have regard to it. It was one of the risks of the business in which he was engaged. To require his employer to warn him, or to guard him against such a risk, would be, therefore, to compel the employer to protect him from a risk concerning which, from the very nature of the case, the employer would have no reason to suppose that the workman needed any warning or protection.

But a master engaged in the construction of a building is liable to a common laborer for injuries caused by falling through an unguarded hole in a temporary floor upon which he had been ordered to go, where the plaintiff took no part in the laying of the floor. Merrill v. Pike, 94 Minn. 186, 102 N. W. 393.

in their hearing to Miles McGrath, "Yes, I examined it before dark, and it is all right." Upon hearing that statement, the foremen, with their men, including Maloney and Allen, went to work loading the fallen rock upon the cars, and the work continued until about 9 o'clock P. M., when a large rock fell from the mountain at the south side of the cut, killing Maloney and Allen and some others. The appellants, who are the widows of the deceased, seek to recover damages which they allege they have sustained by the death of their respective husbands, which they aver was caused by the negligence of the company by not ascertaining by proper inspection the dangerous condition of the premises, and in failing to prop and support the cliff of rock, or rock wall, so as to prevent the same from falling, and in not advising said Maloney and Allen of the dangerous condition of the work, and in not furnishing sufficient light to enable them to observe the safe, or unsafe, condition of the place, and in failing to provide a safe place in which to work. Upon the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, the court, on mo-

And where, in dismantling a building, the master, through his representative, is present and assumes control and direction of the work of furnishing props and supports for the building, it becomes his duty to exercise ordinary care to provide such reasonable precautions as are compatible with the nature and character of the work, to insure a reasonable degree of safety under the attending circumstances. Bloomfield v. Worsster Constr. Co. 118 Mo. App. 254, 94 S. W. 304.

And it cannot be asserted as a matter of law, said the court in Wolf v. Great Northern R. Co. 72 Minn. 435, 75 N. W. 702, that a common laborer engaged in loosening layers of stone in the bottom portion of a wall that is being torn down assumes the risk of the upper part of the wall falling upon him. This case was distinguished from the gravel-pit cases decided against the servant on the ground that the latter was supposed to be acquainted with the effect of the law of gravitation, the court saying that a wall of stone and mortar had lateral strength not found in a bank of earth, so that an ordinarily intelligent man might not readily understand how far he could go with comparative safety when removing foundation stones of the wall. See infra, VI.

And the master is not within the exception to the safe-place rule when it appears that, in building a shed over a sidewalk in the nighttime, guy lines were attached across a street, one of which was struck by a wagon which caused it to sway and throw a workman from a post on which he was standing and to which he was spiking a girder, since the place could not have been reasonably safe when the workmen began their work. Grace & H. Co. v. Kennedy, 40 C. C. A. 69, 99 Fed. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

III. Excavations.

a. In general.

The exception to the safe-place rule is also applied to excavation work. In Gibson v. Midland Bridge Co. 112 Mo. App. 594, 87 S. W. 3, the court said that the rule requiring the master to exercise reasonable care to put the servant to work in a reasonably safe place, though an elemental principle applicable to the relation of master and servant, is subject to exceptions and qualifications, and should not be given to the jury as an unqualified rule in a case where inherent danger lurks in the place which, itself the subject of operation, is undergoing change from the work performed upon it, as where a servant is shoveling dirt at the side of an embankment, a portion of which falls upon him because of the excavation.

In Baird v. Reilly, 35 C. C. A. 78, 63 U. S. App. 157, 92 Fed. 884, the court said that the employer's obligation towards an employee does not oblige him to keep the work place in a safe condition at every moment of the work, so far as its safety depends upon the due performance of their work by the fellow servants of the employee. But in this case a trench caved in, and the master was held liable for not properly shoring it up. The injured servant was not engaged in the work of excavating, but was sent into the trench after it had been dug.

lar bank of earth 14 feet high for the purpose of undermining the bank so that it can be pried off from the top assumes the risk of injury from the falling of the overhanging bank, since the danger to the plaintiff and his fellow workmen is created by themselves during the progress of the work. Logerto v. Central Bldg. Co. 123 App. Div. 840, 108 N. Y. Supp. 604.

Where a pile of clinkers upon which a shoveler is at work is constantly changing by the very work he is doing, he cannot recover for an injury received by the falling of a portion of the pile upon him, on the theory that the master has failed to furnish him a safe place in which to work. The rule that the master is not liable for dangers existing at the place where the servant is sent to work, unless the master knows of the dangers, or might know of them in the exercise of ordinary care, was held to apply with greater force in cases where the conditions surrounding the work are constantly changing owing to the progress of the work. Pre v. Standard Portland Cement Co. (Cal. App.) 100 Pac. 122.

A master is not liable for injury to a coal shoveler caused by a frozen crust of the coal falling on him as it is undermined by the work, on the theory that he has failed in his duty to furnish a safe working place. Miller v. Thomas, 15 App. Div. 105, 44 N. Y. Supp. 277. The court said that, when the plaintiff and those engaged with him commenced to work upon the pile of coal, there was nothing apparently or inherently dangerous in the place or nature of the service, charging the defendant with negligence for setting men at work there. Later, however, in the work as it progressed and in the course of it, the condition was produced which was dangerous to one exposed, as was the plain- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) tiff when he received his injury. When the plaintiff and his coemployees went to work on this pile of coal there was no occasion to apprehend any danger of injury from the service, and whatever hazard followed arose from the manner in which the work was done, and, so far as the place became unsafe, it resulted in the detail of the work, from the method of doing it by the plaintiff and his coemployees. In such case the consequences came within the hazard assumed by them.

A master is not liable for the killing of a servant engaged in excavating a pit in a building in course of alteration, the accident being due to the negligent piling of a number of heavy iron plates close to the edge of the pit, the earth giving way causing some of the plates to fall into the pit, since the place was safe enough until it was made dangerous by the reconstruction operations being carried on. Morgan Constr. Co. v. Frank, 86 C. C. A. 168, 158 Fed. 964. The court said that it could no longer be contended that the duty of providing a safe place or structures extended to places or structures made dangerous by the very work in which the workmen were engaged, so far as safety depended upon the due performance of that work by them or those who stood in law in the relation of fellow servants.

One who is employed in a common work of excavating for and constructing a cement wall assumes the risk of injury by the falling upon him of a stone which has been loosened by a previous blast, since, the place furnished being originally safe, the master is not bound personally to inspect it at every moment of the time during all the changes incident to the performance of the work, having the right to intrust the details ger there was in the situation; and under such circumstances the doctrine of 'safe place' had no application." The same rule is announced in Greeley v. Foster, 32 Colo. 292, 75 Pac. 351, and in Colorado Coal & I. Co. v. Lamb, 6 Colo. App. 255, 40 Pac. 251. The company, therefore, was not remiss in the performance of any duty in failing to furnish a safe place for the deceased to work in, and it is equally clear that, under the existing conditions, it would have been impracticable to prop or support the embankment so as to prevent the rock from falling.

It only remains, therefore, to consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, the appellee was delinquent in the performance of any other duty it owed to the deceased. Counsel for appellants insist that it was incumbent upon appellee to have made a careful and diligent examination of the premises before the men were permitted to work therein. There is no evidence as to what inspection, if any, was made by John McGrath, the foreman of the section, during the afternoon, or what disclosure, if any, as to the result ascertained by such examination, or as to the condition of the premises, was made to the deceased. It does, him. The court said, among other things, that the condition and dangers of such places were liable to change from hour to hour as the work progressed, and the employee himself had much better means of knowing of such condition and dangers than his employer possibly could have.

A master is not liable for an injury to a servant caused by the falling of a rock upon him while he is engaged in taking out coal in a mine. Rolla v. McAlester Coal Co. 6 Ind. Terr. 404, 98 S. W. 141. The decision rests upon the ground that it is not the duty of the master to follow up the servant and see that his place is safe at every moment of the work, and approves the exception to the safe-place rule, that the master is not bound to keep a place in which to work safe which is constantly changing as the work progresses.

A master is not liable for the killing of a miner by reason of the falling upon him of a portion of the roof of the room in which he is working, due to failure properly to prop and support the roof, on the theory that the duty of the master to provide a safe working place cannot be delegated so as to absolve him from liability in case of failure of the vice principal to perform that duty, because in this case the place is not furnished as in any sense a permanent place of work, but is a place in which surrounding conditions are constantly changing, and, instead of being a place furnished by the master for the employees, is a place the furnishing and preparation of which are in themselves part of the work which they are hired to perform. Coal & Min. Co. v. Clay (Consolidated Coal 10 L. R. A. (N.S.)

however, appear that, in response to an inquiry by some one of the foremen, John McGrath stated to Miles McGrath, in the presence and hearing of some of the men, that he had examined it before dark, and it was all right. It was apparent to all, including the deceased, that no inspection other than that made by John McGrath, or someone employed with them in the common work, had been made, and, with this knowledge, they entered upon the work. If he was negligent in his examination, it was the negligence of a fellow servant, of which they cannot complain, and the deceased had no right to assume that any inspection, other than that by a fellow servant, had been made. Judge Lochren, in the opinion above referred to, in discussing this phase of the case, said: "Here all these servants, including the foremen and the roadmaster, were, when the disaster happened, engaged in the common work and enterprise of keeping the railway in proper condition for the passage of trains. The disaster caused an instant, sudden emergency in the very work in which they were engaged,—an emergency admitting of no delay, not even for daylight, certainly not for the summoning of the managing officers of

The rule that the master is bound to furnish his servants a safe place in which to work is not applicable to a case where an experienced miner who is engaged in driving a neck of a room in a mine is killed by the falling of a rock which has been undermined by his work. Heald v. Wallace, 109 Tenn. 346, 71 S. W. 80. The court said that the principle invoked was usually applied to a permanent place, and not to such places as were constantly shifting and being transformed as the direct result of the employee's labor.

In Smith v. Hecla Min. Co. 38 Wash. 454, 80 Pac. 779, in holding that it was erroneous to charge that the law does not, under any circumstances, exact from the servant the use of diligence in ascertaining the defective condition of structures or appliances, but charges him with knowledge of such only as are open to his observation, and that beyond this he has a right to assume without inquiry or investigation that his employer has discharged his duty of furnishing him with a reasonably safe place in which to perform his duties, where a miner known as a "mucker" was injured by the falling of a rock when he knew that "air slacking" was constantly going on, which loosened the rock overhead and made it more dangerous from time to time,—the court said that the very nature of mining was such that the working place of the miners or muckers was constantly undergoing changes. These changes were necessarily accompanied with dangers to the workmen notwithstanding careful inspection and protection by the master. The the railway or of its engineers. The work to be done was simply the rough work of clearing the tracks of the fallen rocks, which the servants, under their foremen and road-master, were entirely competent to perform. The circumstances and conditions must have made it plain to all that no inspection or precaution respecting the cliff was or could have been had, except by such of the servants as were there while it was daylight. Under these circumstances, the servants who came later, as well as those who were there in daylight, assumed the risk of the employment they engaged in; and, if John McGrath or Miles McGrath were negligent in representing the place to be safe, that was negligence of fellow servants. Northern P. R. Co. v. Dixon, 194 U. S. 338, 343, 48 L. ed. 1006, 1009, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 683, 684; Pennsylvania Co. v. Fishack, 59 C. C. A. 269, 123 Fed. 465."

Upon a careful consideration of all the facts disclosed by the record, we think the court below properly directed a verdict in favor of appellee. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Steele, Ch. J., and Bailey, J., concur.

safe-place rule could be applied only in a qualified sense. It was the duty of the master to keep this place in as safe a condition as he could consistently with the reasonable and practicable carrying on of the business. The working place being necessarily dangerous, it was incumbent upon the master to provide for inspection, such inspection as would afford as full security as could reasonably be made practical in view of the nature of the work. But the very conditions of danger which imposed the duty of careful inspection upon the master also imposed a corresponding duty of care upon the servant.

Where a servant was employed in operating a car for the purpose of carrying away loose rock and debris that might result from the work of excavating rock which had fallen from the roof of a mine, and was killed by the falling rock, it was held that the master was not liable, on the ground that the rule as to furnishing a safe place did not apply to cases in which the work the servants were employed to do consisted in making dangerous places safe, or in constantly changing the character of the place for safety as the work progressed. Moon-Anchor Consol. Gold Mines v. Hopkins, 49 C. C. A. 347, 111 Fed. 298.

But the rule which requires the master to furnish a safe place in which to work does not apply where the servant has no part in producing the condition which leads to his injury, as where the servant, who is engaged in loading coal in a mine, is injured by the falling of coal from the face of an entry, due to the carelessness of the master in allowing a cross cut to be developed in ad-

OMAHA PACKING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

LOUIS SANDUSKI.

(84 C. C. A. 89, 155 Fed. 897.)

Master — unsafe platform — injury to servant — liability.

An employee injured by slipping upon a platform used as a passageway in going to and from his work cannot hold the master liable for the injury if the slippery condition was caused by ice formed as a necessary result of trucking done over the platform as part of the regular work of the establishment, or through the negligence of fellow servants, he having long been cognizant of the probability of ice being there in freezing weather.

vance of and close to the rib and face of the entry so as to loosen, crack, and weaken the rib and face of the entry at the point at which he is at work. Superior Coal & Min. Co. v. Kaiser, 229 Ill. 29, 120 Am. St. Rep. 233, 82 N. E. 839.

A servant helping to push out loads of ore through the base of an ore pile does not assume the risk of a portion of the frozen crust of the same falling upon him, since it is the duty of the master to keep the overhanging crust broken down so as to render the place reasonably safe to those working below. Illinois Steel Co. v. Olste, 116 Ill. App. 303, affirmed in 214 Ill. 181, 73 N. E. 422. The court said that the fact that the place might still be dangerous after the master had discharged his duty of making the place as safe as could be reasonably expected, in view of the character of the work to be performed, by the exercise of reasonable care on his part, afforded no reason why he should be absolved from his duty to the servant; but reason and humanity required that the master should be held to the performance of his duty under such circumstances to the end that the hazards of a dangerous situation were not unnecessarily increased by his negligence.

That it is the nature of gneiss rock to disintegrate and fall from time to time at unexpected intervals from the action of the elements operating upon it does not excuse the master from using proper precautions to protect his workmen from a danger known to him, arising from such a cause, as where he has notice of the dangerous character of an overhanging cliff and fails to prop it up. *Pantzar v. Messrs. Constantine J. Smyth and Edward P. Smith, for defendant in error:

The defendant owed the plaintiff a master's duty with respect to the place where the injury happened.

Fitzgerald v. Connecticut River Paper Co.

Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368, 2 N. E. 24. The court said it was those risks alone which could not be obviated by the adoption of reasonable measures of precaution by the master, that the servant assumed.

A miner digging out places in which other miners are to set supporting timbers is not engaged in work which changes the danger of the place, so as to make applicable the exception of the safe-place rule made in such cases. Faulkner v. Mammoth Min. Co. 23 Utah, 437, 66 Pac. 799.

The exception to the safe-place rule as to changing conditions of the working place does not apply where the servant is injured by rock falling from the roof of a stope in a mine, where the stope has been open for several years, and has never been timbered, and where water percolates through the roof of the place of the accident, since the danger is not the result of changing conditions produced by the operations of the workmen, but rather the result of permanent and extraneous causes. Bird v. Utica Gold Min. Co. 2 Cal. App. 674, 84 Pac. 256.

One who is employed as a common laborer to shovel ore into a chute in a stope of a mine is not engaged in work which in itself necessarily changes the character of the place with respect to safety, so as to relieve the master from liability for the former's death caused by the falling of a rock upon him which becomes detached from the hanging wall of a stope. Western Invest. Co. v. McFarland, 166 Fed. 76, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

c. Quarries.

When the servant is at work in a quarry at the foot of a slope from which rock has been blasted, where the conditions of danger must be constantly changing as the work progresses, he is under as much obligation as the master to be on the lookout for falling rocks; and, where he has equal facilities for ascertaining the danger, and continues work, the master is not liable for any injury caused by the sliding of the rock on the slope beneath which the servant is working, unless in some manner he urges or coerces the servant to continue the work after he himself is aware, or should be aware, of the danger. Thompson v. California Constr. Co. 148 Cal. 35, 82 Pac. 367.

A servant employed in the work of "stripping" cement rock from an overlying layer of earth and stone assumes the risk of injury from the falling of a frozen crust of earth and rock from the top of the pit, caused by the excavation. Utica Hydraulic Cement Co. v. Whalen, 117 Ill. App. 23. The court said that this case belonged to that class where the very work the servant was employed to do was constantly producing changes and temporary conditions for the time being more or less hazardous to those engaged in the work, and where it would be practically impossible to keep the conditions safe and prosecute the work.

The master is not liable for injury to a workman in a stone quarry, caused by the undermining of a stone which falls upon him, where, when the servant goes to work, the place is safe, and it is the work done by the servants which dislodges the stone. Welch v. Carlucci Stone Co. 215 Pa. 34, 64 Atl. 392, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 290. The court said the injury occurred while the servant was prosecuting the work in which he was engaged, and as a result of his own labor in digging the earth from under the stone, and was one of the risks incident to his employment.

A quarry man injured by the falling of a piece of rock from above upon a ledge upon which he is working cannot recover for resulting injuries, on the theory that the master has failed to furnish him a safe place in which to work, since the plaintiff and his fellow workmen are practically making the place in which they are to work, and at each succeeding blast the conditions and surroundings are changed. Mielke v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 103 Wis. 1, 74 Am. St. Rep. 834, 79 N. W. 22. The court said the plaintiff was familiar with the situation and appreciated the danger.

A servant hurt by the fall of a stone thrown up by a blast while at work in a quarry cannot recover from the master on the theory that the latter has failed to furnish a safe place, since the master is not required to furnish his servant a safe place in which to work where the danger is temporary only, and when it arises from the hazard and progress of the work itself and is known to the servant. Riner, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the defendant in error by reason of the negligence of the plaintiff in error.

Louis Sanduski, plaintiff in the court be-

A servant engaged in the work of cutting down and blasting away the face of a rocky cliff assumes the risk of injury caused by the falling of a piece of rock from the top of the cliff, which was not there when his work began, since this is a danger occasioned by the general management and prosecution of the work. Di Vito v. Crage, 165 N. Y. 378, 59 N. E. 141, reversing 35 App. Div. 155, 55 N. Y. Supp. 64.

d. Gravel pits.

One who is engaged in wheeling sand assumes the risk of the fall of an overhanging frozen crust caused by the excavation of the sand below, the rule as to the master's duty to furnish a safe place having no application to such a case. Livingstone v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co. 146 Mich. 236, 109 N. W. 431. The court said that there was no danger whatever in doing this work, except such as arose during its progress as a necessary incident of the work itself, which was being performed by the plaintiff and his fellow servants. If any danger arose, it came through the prosecution of the work, and not through the condition of the place furnished by the master in which to work.

A servant employed to release gravel from the slope of a gravel pit so as to cause the gravel to break off and slide down assumes the risk of injury by falling gravel. Swanson v. Great Northern R. Co. 68 Minn. 184, 70 N. W. 978. The court said the place was made dangerous, and its character was low (referred to hereinafter as the plaintiff), at the time of his alleged injuries, January 20, 1906, was in the employ of the Omaha Packing Company, defendant in the court below (referred to hereinafter as the defendant), in its packing house, located at South Omaha, in the hog-casing room, or department, and had been so employed for about three years. The room where the plaintiff worked was located in the third story of the building, connected with the defendant's packing plant and accessible from the street by means of a platform and stairway. The platform was 600 feet long, and between 10 and 14 feet wide. There is some conflict in the evidence as to its exact width. The platform, where it connected with the stairway leading up on the outside of the building to the door of the room where Sanduski worked, was between 10 and 15 feet above the ground. John Tnczar, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that it was "maybe 10 and maybe 12" feet from the foot of the stairs to the edge of the platform. There was a railing along the outside of the stairway, but no railing on the platform. It had, however, two pieces of 2x4 timber spiked to the edge of it. The platform sloped slightly toward the building; the outer edge being about 3 inches higher than the inner edge. The platform was used, not only as a passageway for employees going to and from their work, but also for trucking the product of the plant, as one of the witnesses puts it, "from the beef house to the tank room," located at different points along the platform, and had been so used during the entire time of plaintiff's employment. The testimony shows that in this trucking process, if there was anything wet in the product conveyed by the trucks, the water would drip off on the platform, and that there usually was water dripping from the product carried on the trucks. All of this was known to the plaintiff. He testified that he knew the platform was used by truckers every day, in cold as well warm weather, and that water dripped off the meat carried on the trucks onto the platform, and that during his entire term of service he had used this platform and stairway as a passageway in going to and from his work, sometimes during the daytime and at other times after dark.

As to the condition of the platform on the morning when plaintiff went to work, the testimony is not altogether clear. Tnczar, who went to work about the same time plaintiff did, testified that he did not see any ice on the platform. Zalinski, another witness, could not say whether continually changing, by reason of the work in which the plaintiff was engaged. The progress of the work necessarily changed the character of the place and enhanced the danger, and, under such conditions, it had never been held that it is the absolute duty of the master to furnish the servant a safe place in which to work.

The safe-place rule has no application in the case of a servant at work at the foot of a gravel pit, for, said the court in Christenson v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 27 Utah, 132, 101 Am. St. Rep. 945, 74 Pac. 876, where one engages in employment obviously dangerous, and knows the manner in which it is to be carried on, is familiar with the conditions and surroundings, and is aware that his own work and that of his fellow workmen will constantly change its character, rendering it alternately safe and dangerous, he assumes the risks incident to the employment.

A common laborer working in a gravel pit assumes the risk of injury caused by the gravel caving in upon him, the safe-place rule not applying to such a case. inasmuch as the plaintiff and his fellow servants create the place and its attendant perils from hour to hour in the prosecution of their labors, and the conditions are constantly shifting by reason of their own acts, of which, as well as the probable consequences thereof, they must be held to have notice. Larsson v. McClure, 95 Wis. 533, 70 N. W. 662.

A master is not required to make a gravel pit safe for employees from moment to moment, when the natural support of the bank is being constantly removed, and where the changing conditions must be watched and provided against by the laborers themselves. Montgomery v. Robertson, 229 Ill. 466, 82 N. E. 396.

e. Sewers, trenches, tunnels, etc.

The safe-place rule has no application where the work and the place are coincident, as where the servant is engaged in the construction of a sewer which is rendered unsafe by the failure properly to shore up the sides of the trench. Curley v. Hoff, 62 N. J. L. 758, 42 Atl. 731.

A master is not bound to furnish a laborer who is engaged in digging a trench a safe place in which to work, since the latter is making his own place. Collins v. Crimmins, 11 Misc. 24, 31 N. Y. Supp. 880.

A servant engaged in digging a trench assumes the risk of the falling of the sides upon him, the safe-place rule having no application to a case in which the injury is caused by the work in which the workman is engaged. McKinzie v. Philadelphia, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 293.

The only place that can be furnished to men engaged in excavating a tunnel is the place where the excavation is going on, so that there can be no liability on the part of the master on the theory that he has failed to furnish them a safe place. Ber- there was ice on the platform in the morning. Plaintiff at first said there was ice on the platform, but subsequently said he did not notice whether the platform was frozen or not in the morning. Plaintiff testified that on the day of his injury he went to work in the morning about 6:45, and quit work at about 6:30 in the evening; that it was dark both when he went to work in the morning and when he quit in the evening; that he descended the stairs on the outside of the building leading from the third story down to the platform; that he took a few steps after reaching the platform, when he slipped, and that was all he knew. He testified, also, that the night was foggy. He could not say whether there was ice on the platform, but stated that he felt "under his feet it was kind of slippery, but not long, and slipped, and that is all he knew." The record does not disclose who found him when he was picked up, or the condition in which he was found. Both Tnczar and Zalinski testified that there was ice in ridges on that part of the platform where they trucked beef, and, when asked how high these ridges were, said they were small. Tnczar further testified that the ice came there from the water dripping from the product carried on the trucks and that the ridges were made by the trucks.

The theory upon which the plaintiff sought to recover in this case was that the defendant was negligent, in that it had failed to use reasonable care to provide him with a reasonably safe place in which to work; and it is contended by counsel in their brief that this duty of the master extends to a reasonably safe mode of entrance to and exit from the place where the servant was employed. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the rule in regard to the master's duty to his servant is as broad as contended for by counsel, yet we think there can be no recovery upon the facts as they are presented by this record. Both the platform and stairway were open and exposed. No one knew better than the plaintiff the manner in which the business was carried on there. He knew that this platform was used daily by men trucking the product of the plant from the beef house to the tank room, and that the drippings fell from the trucks upon the platform. He had been coming and going back and forth to his work almost daily over this platform for about three years, as had the other workmen, and that it was, as one of the witnesses described it, "one of the most traveled ways in the establishment."

It is not contended that there was any defect in the platform itself, but it is sought tolami v. United Engineering & Contracting Co. 120 App. Div. 192, 105 N. Y. Supp. 90.

A master is not liable for the death of a servant caused by the caving in of a trench in which he is digging, on the theory that the master has not furnished the servant a safe place in which to work. Durst v. Carnegie Steel Co. 173 Pa. 165, 33 Atl. 1102. The court said that the place as it stood when the work commenced was perfectly safe. The danger could arise only as the work progressed and because of the work done. In such a case the court did not think it was the duty of the employer to stand by during the progress of the work to see when a danger arose. It was sufficient if he provided against such dangers as they might possibly or probably arise, and gave the workmen the means of protecting themselves. They should look out for such dangers, and use the means provided.

A master who has provided necessary sheathing is not liable for the death of a workman who is killed by the caving in of a trench during the progress of the work. Rocco v. F. A. Gillespie Co. 73 N. J. L. 591, 64 Atl. 117. The court said that the work itself involved the place of working. The duty of the work of excavation made the place of working. The workman was creating his own place to work in, and was constantly changing it and making it more and more dangerous as the work progressed. He could know as well as the master, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) even better than he, the danger of the place. It was under his constant observation. The dangers were of his own creation, clearly incident to the work. That such dangers would arise was known to both the master and the servant, and the master, with this knowledge that such danger would thus arise during the progress of the work, provided for use of his servant, when he found its use necessary, the sheathing with which the servant could protect himself, and, with proper care for his own safety, would protect himself. This was the whole duty of the master in such a case.

One employed as a miner in drilling a tunnel does not assume the risk of the failure of the master to take such reasonable precautions as are requisite to prevent the caving and falling of the roof of that part of the tunnel already completed. He assumes the risks incident to the work in front of him, and not the risks of defendant's failure properly to care for that part of the tunnel or place behind him, which he has completed, and turned over to the care and control of the master. Kelley v. Fourth of July Min. Co. 16 Mont. 484, 41 Pac. 273.

The decision in CITRONE v. O'ROURKE ENGINEERING CONSTR. Co. was approved in Bertolami v. United Engineering & Contracting Co. supra, in which it was held that the safe-place rule did not apply where the injured servant was engaged in shoring up the roof of a tunnel and removing iron to charge the defendant with liability upon the sole ground that drippings from the product carried on the trucks on that particular day were permitted to freeze upon the platform, thus making it slippery. The plaintiff must have known the weather conditions before reaching the platform, because he had descended the stairway, which was open and exposed, from the third story of the building, down to the platform, and, if the weather was cold enough to form ice, he must have known that he would necessarily find that portion of the platform over which the trucking was done to some degree in a slippery condition, and that it devolved upon him to use more care than at other times when the weather conditions were more favorable.

The mere fact that an accident happened does not of itself create a presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant. Where negligence is charged as a basis of recovery, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that, by some act or omission, the defendant has violated some duty which he owed to the plaintiff and which caused the injury complained of. The rule is stated by this court in Northern P. R. Co. v. Dixon, 71 C. C. A. 555, 139 Fed. 737, as follows: "The mere happening of an accident which injures a servant fails to indicate whether it resulted from one of the causes the risk of which is the servant's, or from one of those the risk of which is the master's; and, for this reason, it raises no presumption that it was caused by the negligence of the latter. In such cases the burden of proof is always upon him who avers that the negligence of the master caused the accident to establish that fact, and a naked finding, as in this case, that the accident occurred and that the servant was guilty of no negligence which contributed to cause his injury, is insufficient to sustain this burden, for there are many other causes than the negligence of the master and that of the servant, such as the negligence of fellow servants and latent and undiscoverable defects in place or machinery, which may have produced it." Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 67 C. C. A. 421, 132 Fed. 593, and cases there cited.

Neither is the rule which makes it the positive duty of the master to provide the servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, even if it extends to providing a safe mode of entrance to and exit from the place where the workmen are employed, applicable to a case where the place becomes dangerous in the progress of the work, either necessarily or from the manner in which the work is done. In this case, if this platform became dangerous during the day, it was by reason of this trucking columns, which were moved afterward as the work progressed, and were replaced by timbers, and a portion of the roof fell while he was at work and killed him.

In Litchfield v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co. 73 App. Div. 1, 76 N. Y. Supp. 80, it was held that a trench, so far as the excavating gang is concerned, is not a place furnished by the master, but is made by them, and is a detail of their general work; and that therefore the rule as to safe place does not apply; and the fact that a member of an excavating gang finished his work and remained over to assist masons who were sent into the trench, and, while so at work, was injured by a cave-in, was also held to be immaterial.

But a servant who is ignorant of the increased hazard of making an excavation deeper than usual, and is ordered to dig in the trench, the master not having taken sufficient precaution to prevent the sides from falling, does not, by obeying, assume the risk of a cave in, since an employee assumes such risks as are incident to his employment, and do not arise or ensue from negligence of his employer. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ward, 90 Va. 687, 24 L.R.A. 717, 44 Am. St. Rep. 945, 19 S. E. 849.

Although a workman assumes the risk of such transitory changes as are incident to and ordinarily may be expected to occur in the prosecution of the work in which he is engaged, whether arising from the operation of natural causes or otherwise, a servant 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

engaged in the work of digging a trench cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have assumed the risk of injury caused by the falling of an overhanging top crust due to a crack in the earth, when there is nothing to show whether such cracks are liable to occur in digging, and, if so, how frequently, and whether the servant should have anticipated the crack which occurred. McCoy v. Westborough, 172 Mass. 504, 52 N. E. 1064.

f. Unexpected explosions.

The risk of injury from the unexpected explosions in the course of excavation work is assumed by the servant.

A helper on an air-drilling machine assumes the risk of striking a "missed hole" containing an unexploded charge of powder. Browne v. King, 40 C. C. A. 545, 100 Fed. 561. The court said that the measure of the master's duty to his servant while engaged in a work which necessarily involves a constant change of the place itself in which the servant is set to work is: "(1) To exercise reasonable care to have the place in which the servant is to work safe when he is set to work, having regard for the nature and character of the work which is to be done; (2) to furnish reasonably safe machinery, tools, and appliances with which to do the work, having regard to the nature and character of the work, and to exercise reasonable care to keep them so by making carried on in the progress of the work, either necessarily or from the manner in which the work was done by other employees, fellow servants of the plaintiff, engaged in the same general business; and, if the platform became dangerous through their negligence, that was one of the risks which the plaintiff assumed when he entered the defendant's employment. In Deye v. Lodge & S. Mach. Tool Co. 70 C. C. A. 64, 137 Fed. 480, the court said: "Unless the business be of such a complex and dangerous character as to require that it shall be conducted upon a system or scheme, in order to secure the orderly conduct of the business and the safety of those engaged in it, the master's obligation to supply a safe place for his work to be done, and to keep it safe, does not impose the duty of always keeping it in a safe condition so far as its safety depends upon the proper performance of the very work which his servants have there undertaken to do. If a negligent manner of doing the work makes the place less safe, that is one of the risks which all engaged in the work have assumed as a risk of the occupation." American Bridge Co. v. Seeds, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041, 75 C. C. A. 407, 144 Fed. 605; Minneapolis v. Lundin, 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525.

In any aspect, therefore, in which the case may be viewed, on the facts disclosed by this record, we think the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

WESTINGHOUSE, CHURCH, KERR, & COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

DANIEL CALLAGHAN.

(83 C. C. A. 669, 155 Fed. 397.)

Master — fellow servant — negligence — assumption of risk.

1. One who enters the employment of another thereby assumes the risk of the negligence of his fellow servants in the performance of all acts which they do while they are not discharging a positive duty of the master.

Same — change of circumstances.

2. The duty of caring for the safety of a place or of appliances in cases in which the work which the servants are employed to do necessarily changes the character of the place or of the appliances as to safety necessary inspections, repairs, and the like; and (3) to exercise reasonable care to employ competent and fit persons to discharge the several duties they are required to perform, both with reference to the machinery and appliances, as well as other work to be done."

Headnotes by SANBORN, Circuit Judge.

A servant working in a tunnel assumes the risk of injury caused by the explosion of a "missed hole" or unexploded charge left by another shift of men working in the same place. Shaw v. New Year Gold Mines Co. 31 Mont. 138, 77 Pac. 515. The court said that the safe-place rule could have no application to a case in which the plaintiff and his fellow servants were creating the place of work, when it was constantly being changed in character by the labor of the men working upon it, when it became dangerous only by the carelessness or negligence of the workmen or by the negligent manner in which they used the tools or materials furnished for their work, when the dangers which arose were very short-lived, or when by the negligence of the workmen, the place was rendered unsafe without the master's fault or knowledge.

One engaged in sinking a shaft in a mine assumes the risk of injury by the explosion of an unexploded charge in a "missed hole." Anderson v. Daly Min. Co. 16 Utah, 28, 50 Pac. 815. The court said that, where the nature of the business was extremely dangerous, and conditions were necessarily continually changing by reason of placing and setting of blasts whereby dangerous conditions arose continually through the acts of the servant without the knowledge of the master, the employer could not be held responsible therefor without his fault; but such temporary dangerous conditions arose from the nature of the employment, and were among the natural and ordinary risks and hazards attending the employment, for which the master was not liable.

A master is not required to furnish a servant a safe place in which to work where the danger is temporary, and when it arises from the hazard and the progress of the work itself and is known to the servant, such as the danger of unexploded shots left by workmen during the progress of driving a tunnel in a mine. Davis v. Trade Dollar Consol. Min. Co. 54 C. C. A. 636, 117 Fed. 122.

It is not a breach of duty on the part of the master's foreman during the construction of a sewer to send a servant to reload holes that have been drilled for dynamite without cautioning him that there is unexploded dynamite in one of them. Minneapolis v. Lundin, 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525. The court said that the duty of the master to furnish a safe place for the performance of work does not require him to keep that place safe under the constantly changing conditions which the performance of such work as the construction of a sewer necessitates. In this case the city furnished a street in which as the work progresses is the duty of the fellow servants to whom the work is intrusted; and it is not the duty of the master.

Same — grades of service.

3. All who enter the employment of a common master to accomplish a common undertaking are prima facie servants, although their grades of service are different; and some direct and supervise the men subject to their command and their work, while others perform the labor.

Same — risk in direction of men.

4. The servant assumes the risk of the negligence of his superior fellow servant in the direction of the men and the work to the same extent that he assumes the risk of the negligence of the fellow laborer by his side who is engaged in performing the work.

Same — departments.

5. The homogeneous business of a master cannot be divided into distinct and separate departments under the rule in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 383, 37 L. ed. 772, 779, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914, by the testimony to that effect of his servants; and such testimony is incompetent for this purpose. The nature of the business alone can separate it into departments.

Same — negligence of foreman.

6. The plaintiff and D. were employed by the defendant in dismantling heavy machinery in the World's Fair buildings. D. was foreman under a superintendent who was under a manager there. The day before the accident a heavy wooden frame 25 feet high had been erected and temporarily fastened in place with guy ropes under the direction of D., to be used to lift and move the heavy parts of an engine. On the day of the accident the plaintiff and four other men were working under D. to permanently secure this frame in place. D. directed the plaintiff to go upon the frame, and, after he had climbed there for the purpose of moving one of the ropes which held this frame in place so that they could use it at another place as a permanent guy rope, D. untied it below, and the frame fell and injured the plaintiff. Held, D. was not a vice principal, but he was a fellow servant of the plaintiff; and the defendant was not liable for his negligence.

(July 10, 1907.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which the defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Sanborn and Hook, Circuit Judges, and Phillips, District Judge.

Mr. Percy Werner, for plaintiff in error:

The act of Douglas in untying the rope was the act of a fellow servant of plaintiff.

it was safe to construct a sewer. The comparative safety of the place where each man worked was necessarily constantly varied by the progress of the work, and the duty of the master did not extend to keeping every place where each workman labored safe at each moment of the progress of the work. It was the duty of each workman to use reasonable care so to render his service that the place in which he and his fellow servants were required to labor should continue to be reasonably safe. If the place originally furnished by the city became unsafe in the progress of the work it was rendered so, not by any negligence of the city or its superintendent in furnishing it, but by the acts or negligence of the foreman and his workmen in discharging the duties imposed upon them by their common employment, and for these acts and this negligence the city was not responsible.

One who is working in a mine, and who is injured while drilling in a hole in which a charge has failed to explode, cannot recover on the theory that the master has failed to provide a safe place, since the rule does not apply where the place is necessarily dangerous and necessarily changes from time to time as the work progresses. Poorman Silver Mines v. Devling, 34 Colo. 37, 81 Pac. 252.

The master is not liable for the act of a foreman in a cement quarry in putting a servant to work too near an unexploded charge of powder in a hole drilled for blasting, since this is a manner of conducting the work for which servants are responsible. Cullen v. Norton, 126 N. Y. 1, 26 N. E. 905. The court said: "It can't be that, every time a blast was exploded and the men came back, the manner of their distribution for work was a duty of the master, and that the order of a foreman, mistakenly or negligently given, must be regarded as the order of the master in filling a duty to furnish a safe place to work in. It is, as it seems to me, a detail of the working or management of the business, the risks attending which have been assumed by the party taking employment."

An employee engaged in drilling in a pit that is being excavated assumes the risk of injury or death arising from the explosion of dynamite caused in some manner by the drilling, where the existence of the danger could not be the exercise of any ordinary care be ascertained or apprehended. Man-cuso v. Cataract Constr. Co. 87 Hun, 519, 34 N. Y. Supp. 273.

Whipps*, 70 C. C. A. 443, 138 Fed. 13, referred to in the opinion, and which grew out of the same accident. These cases, however, more prop-

Mr. James J. O'Donohoe for defendant in error.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Westinghouse, Church, Kerr, & Company, a corporation, was engaged in dismantling heavy machinery in the World's Fair buildings in St. Louis. Caldwell was its manager and Oldham its superintendent there. According to the most favorable evidence in the record for the plaintiff below, Callaghan, he had worked for this corporation during the Fair, had left his employment for some time, and about the 1st of December, 1904, he returned and applied to Caldwell for his old job. Caldwell referred him to Oldham, the superintendent who employed him. He then labored there three weeks with a gang of men in the power house taking down props, and Douglas worked in the machinery hall with another gang. Douglas was the foreman, and ordered the work to start promptly and gave the plaintiff his orders. On December 24, 1904, Oldham asked the plaintiff if he would work upon Christmas Day, and offered him time and a half. He accepted the offer, and reported to Oldham that he was ready to work. Douglas, on the night before Christmas, ordered him to work and to be out early. On Christmas Day Callaghan, Douglas, Stanley, Dorig, and two other men who had agreed to work on that day appeared and Douglas ordered them to put permanent guy ropes on a heavy wooden frame which had been erected the day before under his direction for the purpose of lifting and removing the heavy materials of which the engines were composed. This frame consisted of four upright pieces of timber 8x8, 25 feet long. Upon the east and west sides heavy timbers 14 feet long had been mortised into the uprights, and there were timbers lying across these from north to south. This frame was temporarily held in position by guy ropes. In order to substitute permanent guy lines for the temporary ones, Douglas, who was a rigger and erly fall within the exception to the safe-place rule which applies to cases in which the servant is employed to make a dangerous place safe. The same may be said of Kletschka v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 80 Minn. 238, 83 N. W. 133, in which it was held that a trackman assisting in repairing a washout on a railroad assumed the risk of injury from falling earth from the bank at the side of the culvert at which he was working, since he must have known that as the work of restoration progressed the condition of the banks and the place where he was working would constantly change, and that the fact that he was temporarily absent from the work and was told to hurry on his return could not relieve him from the duty of using his senses to note changes in the work which were perfectly patent.

V. Completed working place.

a. In general.

The exception to the safe-place rule made in cases in which the conditions of the working place are changing does not necessarily apply only to an uncompleted working place. In Fortin v. Manville Co. 128 Fed. 642, it was held that a servant engaged in carrying piles of cotton on trucks from one place in a cotton house to another assumed the risk of a platform, safe in itself, being rendered dangerous during the progress of the work by the throwing of piles of cotton upon it. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It is not a violation of the master's duty to furnish a safe place to allow coal dust to settle on the floor of a building in which the plaintiff works, and in a trench and pit therein, which explodes and injures the plaintiff, if the place furnished by the master to the servant in which to work is safe as it stands when the work begins, and the danger can arise only as the work progresses and is caused by the work done; since it is not the duty of the employer to stand by during the progress of the work to see when the danger arises, it being sufficient if he provides against such dangers as may possibly arise, and gives the workmen the means of protecting themselves. United States Cement Co. v. Koch (Ind. App.) 85 N. E. 490.

In Moy v. Ocean S. S. Co. 12 Misc. 375, 33 N. Y. Supp. 563, in holding that the master was not liable for the killing of a servant who, while at work in one of the lower holes of a steamship, was struck in passing under a hatchway by a barrel which fell from a sling while being lowered into the hold, the court said that there could be no claim that the servant did not have a reasonably safe place in which to work, for that meant a place in which the permanent constructions had been made with reasonable safety.

A longshoreman who is injured by the falling of a box leaned against the side of a gangway cannot recover damages therefor in a common-law action, since the place is sound and inspect them so that they would be reasonably safe, to drill holes in their faces, charge them with powder, and fire it at the proper times to bring down the coal. This court held that the foreman was not a vice principal, but a fellow servant of the workmen. In Minneapolis v. Lundin, 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525, the city engineer was the general superintendent of all the work of the city. He appointed a superintendent of sewer construction. The latter employed a foreman who superintended and directed the work of a crew of about 50 men. This foreman was empowered to hire and discharge men, and to direct them when, where, and how to work. He ordered one of his gang to reload a hole which had been drilled in a rock, and had been filled with dynamite which had failed to explode, but he did not inform the workman that dynamite remained in the hole. The workman, in ignorance of the presence of the dynamite, proceeded to drill out the hole, the dynamite exploded, and he was injured; but the foreman was held to be his fellow servant. To the same effect are Kansas & A. Valley R. Co. v. Waters, 16 C. C. A. 609, 36 U. S. App. 31, 70 Fed. 28, and The Miami (D. C.) 87 Fed. 757.

The principles and authorities to which reference has been made leave no alternative in the case in hand. The plaintiff and Douglas were engaged in the same work, the work of dismantling heavy machinery, and at the moment of the accident in securing in place for this purpose a frame which had just been erected and which was held in place by temporary guy ropes, a work which necessarily continually changed the character of the place where, and the appliances with which, they were working, as to safety. It was the duty of these servants, of Douglas and Callaghan, and not the duty of the master, to care for the safety of this place in so far as that safety was conditioned by the frame which they were securing in place and their manipulation of it. Douglas was not a vice principal of the master, because he was neither a general manager nor a superintendent of the entire undertaking or of any distinct department of a vast and diversified business. He was not a vice principal because the performance of the specific act which caused the injury was not a part of the positive duty of the master, but one of the duties of the servant. In the performance of these acts, a fellow servant of relation to this frame, the evidence is conclusive that he was discharging no positive duty of his master, but the ordinary duty of a servant. He was, therefore, in the performance of these acts, a fellow servant of the plaintiff, and the defendant was not liable.

The judgment below must accordingly be reversed, and the case must be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

close to the track by a snowplow, since the dangers from the snow bank are such as are inseparable from the operation of the road when snow prevails and is removed from the track. Dowell v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. supra.

Failure of a railroad company to remove ice from the top of a freight car is not a ground of complaint against the master when the servant slips upon the ice and loses his life, since the increased dangers of operating railroads, arising from rain, snow, and ice, or the weather, are a part of the ordinary risks incident to the business. O'Bannon v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 706, 6 S. W. 434.

A master is not liable for injury to a brakeman who slips on snow and ice upon the ground at the side of a track in the neighborhood of a station platform, and falls under the wheels of an engine. Piquego v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 52 Mich. 40, 50 Am. Rep. 243, 17 N. W. 232.

Failure of a railroad company to put ashes or cinders upon snow in its yards where the surface of the snow is very slippery, so as to prevent a switchman from slipping and being hurt, is not sufficient evidence of neglect of duty to take the question of its negligence to the jury, since it is practically impossible, in view of the number and size of railroad yards and the frequent falls of snow and changes of weather in northern winters, to adopt such a method. Fay v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 72 Minn. 192, 75 N. W. 15.

In American Bridge Co. v. Bainum, 76 C. C. A. 633, 146 Fed. 367, in holding that negligence could not be imputed to the defendant on the theory that his foreman knew of the icy condition of steps over which the plaintiff had been ordered to go, and failed to warn him of their condition, the court said that it was a casual condition due to constantly recurring states of temperature, conditions that were observable by the most ordinary intelligence, and at such seasons requiring everywhere and at all times to be guarded against, and demanding only the most ordinary care to avoid their danger.

So, where water from a tank ran over the tracks of a railroad company, and the brakeman slipped and fell, it was held that the question whether the defendant was negligent in allowing the tank to become leaky, or whether the ice was formed from water which was unavoidably spilled upon the ground, should have been submitted to the jury. McFall v. Iowa C. R. Co. 96 Iowa, 723, 65 N. W. 321.

But, although a servant whose duty it is to superintend the placing of cars in position at a mill for loading, which necessitates his standing upon the steps of the mill, assumes the natural and necessary

v.

CITY OF WALLA WALLA, Appt.

(50 Wash. 470, 97 Pac. 408.)

Master—work in ditch—responsibility.

1. One who puts his servant to work in a ditch is bound, when he takes upon himself the direction and control of the work, to see that the place is reasonably safe when the servant enters it, and is kept reasonably safe so long as the servant is required to stay there.

Trial—negligence—jury.

2. Whether or not a master, in attempting to remove a tongue of earth from between two ditches, renders the place where the servant is to work unsafe by attempting to throw down too long a section at one time without precautions to prevent accident in case of mistake of judgment, is for the jury, where there is a fair inference from the evidence that such is the fact.

Master—unsafe working place—duty of servant.

3. A servant called from other work to assist in a ditch, upon work of the manner of doing which the master assumes direction and control, is not bound to inquire into the safety of the place where he is told to stand while working.

Trial—obvious dangers—jury.

4. Whether the dangers of a place in which hazards of his employment by reason of snow and ice, he does not assume the risk of slipping upon ice formed upon the steps from snow melting on the roof and the water running down upon the steps and freezing in ridges, where it remains for some three days before the accident. Harding v. Railway Transfer Co. 80 Minn. 507, 83 N. W. 395.

So, a railroad company may become liable for injury to a brakeman who, in the performance of his duty, slips upon a ridge of ice inside a rail upon a side track at a station, which forms several weeks before the accident; and the question of the company's negligence in such a case is properly submitted to the jury. Sankey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 39, 91 N. W. 820.

A railroad company which allows a narrow ridge of ice to accumulate between the rails of a track in a yard in a large city, and to remain concealed under a fall of snow for a week, so that a switchman slips upon it and is injured, is guilty of negligence in failing to keep the place reasonably safe for its employees to work in. Rifley v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 72 Minn. 469, 75 N. W. 704.

A brakeman does not assume the risk of injury caused by stepping upon a ridge of snow packed hard between the outside rail of a side track and perpendicular banks and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a servant is directed to work were so plain and obvious that persons would not differ concerning it, so that the servant assumes the risk of working there over the positive assurance of the master that it is safe, is a question for the jury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Walla Walla County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

VI. Illustrative cases—obvious risks.

It should be observed in conclusion that many of the cases the facts of which are similar to those hereinbefore discussed have turned upon grounds which would absolve the master from liability, even if the condition of the working place were completed and unchanging. Most of these cases are decided against the servant on the ground that the risk was obvious. The following cases illustrate the point:

In Cully v. Northern P. R. Co. 35 Wash. 241, 77 Pac. 202, it was held that the safe-place rule does not apply in a case in which the servant is working in and about a gravel pit, and is injured by reason of a slide.

A servant employed in a stone quarry assumes the risk caused by the falling of a bank under which he is working at the time of the accident. Western Stone Co. v. Musial, 85 Ill. App. 82.

One who is engaged in digging a 20-foot bed of gravel from under a thin stratum of common earth is bound to know that character of the place in which the work is done, the rule that the master is required to furnish a reasonably safe place does not apply.

when the earth is undermined it will cave in and fall; and he therefore assumes the risk of injury from such cause. Griffin v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 124 Ind. 326, 24 N. E. 888.

A servant removing ensilage from a silo by taking out from the bottom of the mass assumes the risk of injury caused by the falling of a portion of the pile as it is undermined, since, said the court in Welch v. Brainard, 108 Mich. 38, 65 N. W. 667, it is evident that a portion would necessarily break and fall if its cohesiveness was overcome by the weight of the overhanging mass, in obedience to a law of nature that even children understand.

The liability of an embankment of sand and gravel to fall during the process of mining is one of the risks incident to the service of one employed as a common laborer to work in a pit to assist in the removal of the material. Swanson v. Lafayette, 134 Ind. 625, 33 N. E. 1033.

One who works in a gravel pit assumes the risk of a cave in. A servant entering an employment which is from its nature necessarily hazardous assumes all the usual risks and perils incident to the service. Railsback v. Wayne County Turnp. Co. 10 Ind. App. 622, 38 N. E. 221. In this case the court said that it was not controverted, but that the condition of the pit was open alike to the observation of master and servant.

A common laborer engaged with others in loading flat cars with a steam shovel at a gravel pit assumes the risk of the danger of the bank caving in, constantly attending him when at work, since a person of ordinary intellect must know and understand the operation of the law of gravitation. Reiter v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 72 Minn. 225, 75 N. W. 219. To the same effect are Pederson v. Rushford, 41 Minn. 289, 42 N. W. 1063, and Griffin v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 124 Ind. 326, 24 N. E. 888.

One engaged in shoveling dirt from a bank of earth assumes the risk of a portion of the bank falling upon him, where he assists in creating whatever danger there is in undermining the bank, and must know as clearly as anyone the results likely to ensue from the work. *Rasmussen v. Henderson, 134 Ind. 636, 33 N. E. 1021, subsequent appeal, 142 Ind. 596, 42 N. E. 216.

A laborer digging a ditch through a soil composed mostly of sand and gravel assumes the risk of injury caused by the caving in of its sides, since the liability of a trench to cave in by reason of the peculiarity of the soil and the danger attending the work is alike open to the observation of all the parties. Vincennes Water Supply Co. v. White, 124 Ind. 376, 24 N. E. 747.

But a common laborer, while shoveling dirt dislodged from an embankment above him, does not assume the risk of a portion of the earth falling upon him which has become separated from the main bank by seams extending to a depth of 3 or 4 feet, which are not visible to him, since it is a danger not apparent to him, and not inherent to the employment. Gibson v. Midland Bridge Co. 112 Mo. App. 594, 87 S. W. 3.

A common laborer engaged in the work of removing earth from the surface of iron ore, the earth consisting of a sort of hardpan which has to be blasted before it can be removed in any quantity, does not, as a matter of law, assume the risk of the falling of a mass of earth which is loose in the bank above him, it not being apparent to a man of ordinary intelligence that this mass of earth is liable to fall. Hill v. Winston, 73 Minn. 80, 75 N. W. 1030.

A green hand employed in leveling ground to lay a track for a steam shovel as it worked its way into a bank of gravel which was being excavated, where the danger was foreseen by the master and not by the servant, did not assume the risk of a cave in. Daly v. Kiel, 106 La. 170, 30 So. 254.

In Fitzgerald v. Connecticut River Paper Co. 155 Mass. 155, 31 Am. St. Rep. 537, 20 N. E. 464, the court declared that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that the servant assumed the risk of slipping on icy steps of a mill on going from work, although she knew that the steps were icy and that there was some danger of passing over them, their condition in regard to slipperiness constantly changing in different states of the weather, with spray falling daily from the steam pipe in the building and freezing upon them. The court is, however, here referring to the changing conditions only as they affect the question of obvious risk and as bearing upon the question of whether the servant knew just how slippery the steps were when she attempted to go down them, and is not referring to the changing conditions as to slipperiness as affecting the master's duty to furnish a safe working place.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1907, the city of Walla Walla was engaged in putting in a pipe line for the purpose of conveying water from the source of supply down to the city. A large ditch had been dug in which to lay the pipe, which, at the place of the accident herein-after mentioned, was some 7 feet in depth. At that place, also, it was desired to put a fork in the pipe line, and to that end the ditch had been forked, leaving a tongue of earth between the forks, which ranged in width from a few inches at the point of junction to 4 or 5 feet at a point some 60 feet therefrom. In laying the pipe it was found necessary to remove this tongue of earth, and workmen under the direction of a foreman were placed at that duty. The method adopted was to cut it off into sections, undermine the section on one side, push it over, and throw the crumbled earth from the ditch. One such section, some 10 feet in length, had been thrown down, and the workmen were engaged on the second section when it fell, crushing and killing William H. Hilgar, the husband of the respondent, and the person for whose death she sues in this action.

The evidence concerning the surroundings and the conditions immediately preceding and at the time of the accident is conflicting. That most favorable to the respondent's contention, and which the jury must have believed in order to reach their verdict, tended to show that Hilgar was not a part of the crew who were originally put to work removing the earth, but that he was connected with the work of laying the pipe, and came to the ditch at the foreman's call after the first section had been thrown down, and after an unsuccessful effort had been made to throw down the second; that he was instructed to take a pick and undermine at a particular place; and that while he was doing so the earth fell on him and crushed him. The evidence also tended to show that the section they were attempting to throw down was too long to be handled with safety, unless braced or otherwise made secure while the process of undermining was being carried on, and that everything was done under the direct supervision of the appellant's foreman, who stood on the tongue just beyond the end of the section to be thrown down and directed the workmen when and where to dig, and when to make an effort to push the section over. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the respondent, and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal is taken. On the appeal no question of law is presented, save that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

While counsel have filed able and exhaustive briefs, we do not feel that the case requires more than a brief discussion upon our part. We think that the questions whether the death of Hilgar was caused by the negligence of the city, and whether he was guilty of contributory negligence, in case negligence on the part of the city to be found to exist, were questions to be determined by the jury. A master who puts his servant to work in a ditch or other excavation stands under an obligation, when he takes upon himself the direction and control of the work, to see that the place is reasonably safe when the servant enters it, and is kept reasonably safe as long as the servant is required to stay therein. It seems to us that it is a fair inference from the evidence that this was not done in the present instance. It is a fair inference that the place was rendered unsafe because too long a section was attempted to be thrown down at one time and no precautions were taken to prevent accident in case of a mistake of judgment. These were questions, at least, on which the minds of men might reasonably differ; and, being so, it is the province of the jury, and not the court, to draw the inference.

So, likewise, on the question of the injured person's contributory negligence. Since the master called him from other work to assist in this particular work, and assumed to direct and control his manner of doing the work, he was under no primary duty to inquire into the safety of the place where he was told to stand while working. He had the right to assume that the master had already inquired into the conditions, and would either direct him into a reasonably safe place, or warn him of the dangers of the place into which he was directed, so that he could either refuse to work there or take his own precautions for safety. The servant has the right to rely on the assurance of the master, implied from the fact that he is directed to work in the particular place, that the place selected for him to work is reasonably safe. It is only when the danger is so plain and obvious that no two opinions can be had concerning it, that the servant assumes the risk of the conditions over the positive assurance of the master that it is a safe place. Whether the dangers of this place were thus plain and obvious was manifestly a question for the jury.

These are the only questions presented by the record, and we think the court did not err in submitting them to the determination of the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

LILLY NEAL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF FLORIDA.

(55 Fla. 140, 46 So. 845.)

Embezzlement — master's property — servant — conversion.

Evidence that a laundress, upon discovering in a clothes basket committed to her a bag of money belonging to her employer, accidentally placed therein, recognized her duty to return the bag to its owner, but subsequently, and before so returning it, fraudulently converted the money, will support a conviction of embezzlement under Gen. Stat. 1906, § 3311, condemning the act by a servant as to anything of value which has come into his possession, care, custody, or control by reason of his employment.

(Taylor and Parkhill, JJ., dissent.)

(June 8, 1908.)

Headnote by COCKRELL, J.

Case Note. — Does wrongful appropriation of money received through mistake constitute embezzlement?

This question naturally depends upon the language of the particular statute under which the prosecution is had. No case other than NEAL v. STATE is found, however, wherein a statute defining and providing for embezzlement is construed to cover the wrongful appropriation of money or property received by mistake.

One of the leading cases on this subject is Com. v. Hays, 14 Gray, 62, 74 Am. Dec. 662. The statute under which prosecution was had in that case provided that, "if any person to whom any money, goods, or other property which may be the subject of larceny shall have been delivered, shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or shall secrete with intention to embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, such money, goods, or property, or any part thereof, he shall be deemed, by so doing, to have committed the crime of simple larceny." In holding that one who received money, more than was due, paid to him by mistake, was not guilty of embezzlement under this statute, the court construed the statute as intended to embrace cases where property had been designedly delivered to a person as a bailee or keeper, and had been fraudulently conveyed by him.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Marion County to review a judgment convicting defendant of embezzlement. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. B. Bullock for plaintiff in error.

Cockrell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon application of the plaintiff in error, it being made satisfactorily to appear that the omission of the motion for new trial from the bill of exceptions was due wholly to an accidental and mechanical misplacing of the pages of the transcript, a correction has been allowed and a rehearing granted.

There was evidence from which the jury was permitted to find the following facts: Mrs. Henderson, the wife of the prosecuting witness, by accident put into the basket containing soiled clothes a cloth bag containing over $2,000 in paper money, which was delivered to her laundress, Lilly Neal. Upon opening the bundle at her home, Lilly discovered the money, and at once exclaimed to one who was present, "Look here, Frank, what Mrs. Henderson put in the clothes; I will take it back to her now,"—but was afterwards persuaded or coerced by Frank not to do so. She subsequently denied having received the money. The single question presented is whether statutory embezzlement has been made out; the contention being that the acts constitute larceny rather than embezzlement.

In Finlayson v. State, 46 Fla. 81, 35 So. 203, we held that one who obtains possession by trick, device, or fraud with intent at the time to appropriate the property to his own use, the owner intending to part with the possession only, may be guilty of larceny; but in Wilson v. State, 47 Fla. 118, 36 So. 580, we refused to interfere with a conviction of embezzlement, there being sufficient in the evidence upon which to base a finding that the original taking was innocent, and that the felonious intent was formed after the possession was innocently acquired.

In the case now before us no trespass of any kind was committed by Lilly when she discovered her accidental custody of the money; and her intent at once to restore that custody to the rightful owner was manifested and declared. So far the case lies clearly on the side of embezzlement rather than of larceny (see R. v. Ashwell, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 190); but does it yet measure up fully to the crime of which conviction was had?

In Tipton v. State, 53 Fla. 69, 43 So. 684, we said that one who is not lawfully the agent or servant of another, and does not pretend or hold himself out to be such, and holds no relation of trust or confidence towards his alleged principal or master, is not within the statute. Tipton was indicted on two counts, in the one for embezzling from R. A. Lamb, and in the other from the express company, and was convicted of the latter. The evidence showed plainly that Lamb's property was taken and that Lamb alone employed Tipton; the express company being concerned neither with the property converted nor with the employment of Tipton.

Lilly Neal acquired the custody of the cloth bag containing the roll of money only by virtue of her employment. We may admit that possession in its narrow, technical sense was never rightfully hers; but that admission does not help. Our statute is much broader than that of other states, and includes whatever may have come into an employee's possession, care, custody, or con-

In this class of cases it is said that there exists "the element of a trust or confidence reposed in a person by reason of the delivery of property to him, which he voluntarily takes for safe-keeping, and which trust or confidence he has violated by the wrongful conversion of the property. Beyond this the statute was not intended to go. Where money paid, or property delivered, through mistake, has been misappropriated or converted by the party receiving it, there is no breach of a trust or violation of a confidence intentionally reposed by one party and voluntarily assumed by the other. The moral turpitude is therefore not so great as in those cases usually comprehended within the offense of embezzlement; and we cannot think that the legislature intended to place them on the same footing."

This case was cited with approval in State v. Heath, 8 Mo. App. 99. The facts of that case, however, do not bring it within the scope of this note.

In Fulcher v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 621, 25 S. W. 625, the same construction was also placed upon a statute providing that "any person having possession of personal property of another, by virtue of a contract of hiring, or borrowing, or other bailment, who shall, without consent of the owner, fraudulently convert such property to his own use, with the intent to deprive the owner of the value of the same, shall be guilty of theft." It was accordingly held that one who mistakenly was overpaid a check could not be convicted of a fraudulent conversion under this statute; and it was said that money paid by mistake cannot be held to be a bailment, as there was no intent on the part of the payor to deliver the money for any purpose.

The general question of want of authority of defendant to receive money or property in the first instance, as affecting crime of embezzlement, is discussed in a note to Smith v. State, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531.

trol by reason of his employment. The statute is not in terms restrictive to a conscious act on the part of the owner or employer, and there is here present the conscious act on the part of the employee voluntarily accepting for a time the custodianship of the money, recognizing her obligation to return it to its rightful owner, for whom she was then holding it, a self-imposed, but accepted, bailment, so to speak, imposed only by reason of the fact that the holder was intrusted with employment by the owner, and thereby had secured possession of the larger receptacle that contained the soiled clothes, as also the bag of money.

A search of the authorities has given us little or no assistance, because of the more limited definition of "embezzlement" usually obtaining. A close consideration of our own statute, however, leads us to the conclusion that the peculiar facts of this case come within its condemnation and that the verdict is not against the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Shackleford, Ch. J., and Whitfield, J., concur.

Hocker, J., concurs in the opinion.

Taylor, J., dissenting:

After mature reflection, I am unable to agree to the conclusion reached in the opinion prepared in this case by Mr. Justice Cockrell that, under our statute, a case of embezzlement is made by the facts in proof. Those facts, in brief, are that the owner of quite a large sum of money exceeding $1,000 unintentionally and carelessly placed the receptacle that contained it in a basket of soiled clothing. This clothing, but not the money, was intentionally sent to the defendant to be laundered; the owner not dreaming that he was at the same time sending her his money. She discovered the mine of wealth of which she had so accidentally come in possession, and, listening to the voice of a tempter, appropriated it to her own use. There was no intentional intrusting of the money by its owner to the defendant by reason of any confidence reposed in her in her capacity as his laundress, or in any other capacity, and in the course of her employment in such capacity there was nothing that called for, necessitated, or made it at all usual, proper, or customary for him to intrust her with a cent of his money, and neither did the defendant accept, obtain the custody, or control, or acquire the possession of, the money in any capacity of trust or confidence intentionally reposed in her. She did not, therefore, occupy at any time towards such money the attitude of a trustee that is 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

necessary in embezzlement as distinguished from larceny. Suppose, arguendo, the owner of this money, after placing it in the soiled clothes basket purely through accident and without intending to do so, and really without knowing that he had done so, had then sent what he supposed and intended to be soiled clothes only by his hired man of all work to be delivered to the defendant, his laundress, and such hired man on the way had discovered the money and appropriated it to his own use, would it have been larceny or embezzlement? I think it would be larceny pure and simple. And, if so in his case, then it is equally so in the case of the laundress, because in both cases there is, with reference to such appropriated money, a total lack of that feature of trust reposed and trust accepted and violated that is necessary in embezzlement. I cannot conceive of such a state of things as a trust accidentally and unintentionally reposed by one person in another. Trust and distrust are both active sentiments, and cannot be exercised passively, accidentally, or unintentionally. I think the facts in proof make a case only of larceny here, and not embezzlement. Com. v. Hays, 14 Gray, 62, 74 Am. Dec. 662.

Parkhill, J., dissenting:

I think all the authorities without exception hold that the gist of the offense of embezzlement is a breach of trust, and the provisions of the statute do not apply to appropriation of property by a person, unless he held a relation of confidence or trust towards the owner, and had possession of the property by virtue of such relation, and converted it in violation of the trust reposed in him. Tipton v. State, 53 Fla. 69, 43 So. 684.

In writing of the confidence of the defrauded person in the one embezzling, Mr. Bishop says: "The leading doctrine under this subtitle is that the statutes are for the protection of employers against the frauds of those in whom they have confided; and, where no confidence is reposed, and none is violated, the offense is not committed." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 352. Mr. Clark says: "The gist of the offense is a breach of trust; and it is held that the statutes do not apply to appropriation of property by any person unless he held a relation of confidence or trust towards the owner, and had possession of the property by virtue of such relation, and converted it in violation of the trust reposed in him." [Crim. Law, p. 274.]

In 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 990, it is said: "By some statutes it is required that the property shall have come into the possession of the servant by virtue of his employment," or "in the course of his employment." Under such a statute as this, a person who receives money belonging to another and fraudulently converts the same to his own use is not guilty of embezzlement unless he received the same by virtue of or in the course of his employment, as the statute expressly requires this.

I am of the opinion that the breach of trust or violation of confidence here contemplated must have been intentionally reposed by one party and voluntarily assumed by the other. See Com. v. Hays, 14 Gray, 62, 74 Am. Dec. 662. In the Hays Case the court held that, where property delivered through mistake has been misappropriated or converted by the party receiving it, there is no breach of a trust or violation of a confidence intentionally reposed by one party and voluntarily assumed by the other.

Our statute provides that, if any servant embezzles or fraudulently disposes of or converts to his own use, or takes or secretes with intent so to do, anything of value which has been intrusted to him, he shall be punished as if he had been convicted of larceny. I do not think anyone could intrust anything to another through mistake. To intrust is to commit with confidence, give in trust, confide, to place in charge, to commit something to as a trust.

The other clause of our statutes, "or has come into his possession, care, custody, or control by reason of his employment," is equivalent to the preceding clause, "which has been intrusted to him." The words "by reason of his employment" must have reference to the property which came into his possession, care, custody, or control, and which was embezzled.

The soiled clothes were in the possession, care, custody, or control of the defendant by reason of her employment as laundress. Her employment had reference to the washing of the soiled clothes. A misappropriation of the clothes would be embezzlement clearly. The defendant's employment had no reference to the money put into the basket by accident. The conversion of the money by the defendant was larceny.

In Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 493, the author says: "In order to constitute the crime of embezzlement, it is necessary that the property embezzled should come lawfully into the hands of the party embezzling, and by virtue of the position of trust he occupies to the person whose property he takes." In § 496 the same author says: "Before embezzlement can be maintained, it must appear that the property was delivered to the accused in some fiduciary capacity,—a relation of trust and confidence." The very property converted, then, must have been delivered to the accused in a fiduciary capacity to make him guilty of embezzlement. The property converted, the bag of money, was not delivered to the accused in a fiduciary capacity. It was not delivered to the accused at all. The soiled clothes were delivered to the accused, and the money was taken with the clothes by mistake. The owner of the money did not intend that the defendant should take the money, only the clothes.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

JAMES FOREMAN, Appt.,
v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(— Iowa, —, 116 N. W. 724.)

Damages—mental suffering—telegram—relative by affinity.

1. No presumption of mental suffering will arise in case of failure to deliver a telegram announcing the death of a relative by affinity only, such as a son's wife; and therefore to recover damage for such Case Note.—Necessity and degree of relationship essential to recover for mental anguish for failure to deliver telegram announcing death or illness.

The earlier cases upon this subject are collected and discussed in a case note to Randall v. Western U. Tel. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 277. In addition to the cases there cited, a few cases decided subsequently to the preparation of that note may be given.

Where damages are sought for the failure to transmit or deliver a telegram announcing the sickness or death of a relative, it was held, in Lee v. Western U. Tel. Co. (Ky.) 113 S. W. 55, that no recovery can be had unless the relationship existing between the parties is that of parent and child, husband and wife, sister and brother, or grandparent and grandchild.

And in Johnson v. Western U. Tel. Co. 81 S. C. 235, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 62 S. E. 244, it was held that mental anguish will not be presumed to exist for deprivation of opportunity to attend the funeral of a first cousin.

In Western U. Tel. Co. v. McMorris (Ala.) 48 So. 349, it was held that the relationship of brothers fell within that limited degree of relationship from which it might be said that mental anguish arose naturally and proximately from a breach of contract to transmit and deliver telegraphic messages. But an uncle or brother by marriage is not within such relationship. Western U. Tel. Co. v. Long, 148 Ala. 202, 41 So. 965.

suffering in such cases facts must be pleaded and proved showing special friendship or affection, although it is not necessary to show that the telegraph company had notice of such facts.

Telegraph company—notice of relationship.

2. The relationship of the parties need not appear on the face of the telegram announcing a death, to render the company liable for damages for mental suffering in case it fails to deliver it, if it had knowledge of such relationship.

Same—notice of suffering.

3. A telegraph company cannot escape liability for damages for mental suffering of a man because, through its failure to deliver a telegram to his father announcing the death of his wife, he is deprived of the presence of the father at the funeral, on the ground that it was not informed that its failure would cause such suffering.

(June 10, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Buchanan County in his favor for a less sum than demanded in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cook & Cook for appellant.

Messrs. George H. Fearons, Parker, Hewitt, & Wright, and E. E. Hasner, for appellee:

The addressee of the undelivered message, having been related to the deceased by affinity only, cannot recover damages for alleged mental anguish caused him by the nondelivery of the message, because he failed to show notice to the defendant company, contemporaneous with the filing of the message, of the existence of special relations of cordiality and affection, from which special relations alone the alleged mental anguish could arise.

Co. v. Birchfield, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 664, 38 S. W. 635.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition is in two counts. In the first plaintiff asks damages for pain and anguish resulting from the failure of defendant to deliver a telegram sent by plaintiff's son from Wausa, Nebraska, announcing the death of the son's wife; and, in the second, for pain and anguish suffered by the son resulting from the nondelivery of the message to plaintiff, the said claim having been assigned to plaintiff. It was alleged in each count that defendant, when it received the message, was informed that it related to the death of the son's wife. The message read as follows:

To James Foreman,

Independence, Iowa.

Sena died at 2:30 this P. M.

W. J. Foreman.

September 22nd, 1906.

—and the charge upon the same was $1, which was paid by the son, W. J. Foreman. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, the trial court directed a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1, the amount paid for sending the message. The motion was sustained on the theory that the failure to deliver the message was not the proximate cause of the pain and suffering; that the relationship of the parties being by affinity only was, not such that pain and suffering would be presumed; that it did not appear from the message that it was desired that plaintiff should attend the funeral, and that the defendant had no notice that any such attendance was desired, or that any special relations existed between plaintiff and his daughter-in-law as that pain and suffering would follow from the nondelivery of the message. Neither count of the petition contains an allegation of any special relations of friendship or affection between plaintiff and his daughter-in-law; nor does it charge the defendant with notice or knowledge thereof.

It is contended for appellee that, as there was no blood relationship between the plaintiff and his daughter-in-law, no presumption of pain and suffering obtains, and that it was incumbent on plaintiff to show by allegation and proof that such relations in fact existed between them as that pain and suffering in fact arose out of the nondelivery of the message, and that defendant had knowledge thereof. As to the second count of the petition, it is contended that, as the son did not notify the telegraph company when he filed the message that he would suffer if his father were prevented from attending the funeral, no damages are recoverable beyond the nominal sum paid for the message. It is further argued that the testimony shows that the son's suffering, if any, was due to the failure not only of the father to attend the funeral of his wife, but also to his sisters' absence from the funeral; and that the son did not distinguish the suffering sustained by reason of the failure of the father to attend from that of his anguish over the nonappearance of his sisters. The negligence of the defendant in failing to make delivery of the telegram is practically conceded, and our discussion will be confined to the propositions above stated.

That there may be recovery of substantial damages due to pain and suffering from the nondelivery of a death message is the rule of this court. See Mentzer v. Western U. Tele. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L.R.A. 72, 57 Am. St. Rep. 204, 62 N. W. 1; Cowan v. Western U. Tele. Co. 122 Iowa, 379, 64 L.R.A. 545, 101 Am. St. Rep. 268, 98 N. W. 281; Hurlburt v. Western U. Tele. Co. 123 Iowa, 295, 98 N. W. 794. In each of these save the Cowan Case there was a blood relationship between the parties. In Cowan's Case the sender of the message was the wife of the deceased, and the message was to be delivered to her relatives. These cases also establish the rule that, when there is a close blood relationship, friendly, affectionate, and cordial relationships will be presumed, and that there need be no affirmative proof that they existed. The question we now have before us is: Will such relations be presumed in cases where the parties are not related by blood, but by affinity only? Upon this proposition there is a sharp and decided conflict in the authorities. The action being for tort, our rule is "that the party at fault must respond for all the injurious results which flow therefrom by ordinary and natural sequence without the interposition of any other negligent act or overpowering force." That one will suffer from failure to deliver a message relating to the death of a near relative is to be presumed, and damages therefrom follow as an ordinary and natural sequence; but, where the relationship is by affinity, and no facts are either pleaded or proved showing any special friendship or affection, no presumption of pain and suffering should arise for 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is common knowledge that from such relationship alone no presumption arises which will justify an inference that for failure to deliver a message pain and suffering will result. Some cases, and perhaps a majority of them, go to the extent of holding that, even if such special relations of affection and friendship exist, there is no liability on the part of the telegraph company unless it has knowledge or notice thereof. But this rule does not appear to us to be sound. The question we regard as one of presumption of pain and suffering, rather than of notice to the company. If the special relations existed, damage followed as a necessary sequence, and it is not necessary to show that the defendant had knowledge of these special relations. The message related to the death of the son's wife, and of this defendant had knowledge. The relationship of the parties need not appear upon the face of the message, nor is it essential that defendant should know of the special relations existing between the parties interested. That some damage would likely be expected to follow from failure to deliver, defendant well knew; and it is not essential that it be advised of the exact damage to be anticipated. Lyne v. Western U. Tele. Co. 123 N. C. 129, 31 S. E. 350; Cashion v. Western U. Tele. Co. 124 N. C. 459, 45 L.R.A. 160, 32 S. E. 746; Kennon v. Western U. Tele. Co. 126 N. C. 232, 35 S. E. 468; Bennett v. Western U. Tele. Co. 128 N. C. 103, 38 S. E. 294; Hunter v. Western U. Tele. Co. 135 N. C. 458, 47 S. E. 745; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Coffin, 88 Tex. 94, 30 S. W. 896; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Crocker, 135 Ala. 492, 59 L.R.A. 398, 33 So. 45. The rule above announced seems to be sound in principle, although it is not in accord with that adopted in Alabama, South Carolina, and Texas. See Western U. Tele. Co. v. Ayers, 131 Ala. 391, 90 Am. St. Rep. 92, 31 So. 78; Butler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 77 S. C. 148, 57 S. E. 757; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Wilson, 97 Tex. 22, 75 S. W. 482. Of the South Carolina cases it may be said that they are based upon a statute allowing recovery by blood relatives. See Amos v. Western U. Tele. Co. 79 S. C. 259, 60 S. E. 660. And in Alabama the rule is somewhat in doubt in view of the decision in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Crocker, supra. By reason of plaintiff's failure to allege special, affectionate, friendly, and cordial relations between him and his son's wife, the trial court was right in directing a verdict on the first count of the petition.

2. The second count of the petition is for mental anguish suffered by the son because of his father's failure to attend the funeral of the wife. The defendant was notified, when the message was filed, that it related to the wife of W. J. Foreman. It is contended that defendant is not liable on this count, for the reason that it was not notified that the son would suffer if his father should be prevented from attending the funeral. There is no merit in this contention, although it seems to have some support in the casca. See Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Luck, 91 Tex. 178, 66 Am. St. Rep. 869, 41 S. W. 469; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weniski, 84 Ark. 457, 106 S. W. 486. Our own case of Cowan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, seems to settle this proposition in favor of appellant. Moreover, the cases relied upon by appellee are not strictly in point. In view of the holding in Cowan's Case, there is no need for further discussion of this matter. See also, as sustaining the same rule, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crocker, supra; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griffin, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 306, 65 S. W. 661. The trial court was in error in directing the verdict on this count.

3. One ruling on the admission of testimony is complained of. If there be error here, it was afterward cured, for the same matter was proved by another witness.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment must be, and it is, reversed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

HENRY E. SAYLOR et al., Appts.,
v.

GEORGE C. DUEL et al.

(236 Ill. 429, 86 N. E. 119.)

Election — contest — appeal.

1. A provision in a local-option law that the county court shall have final jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter of contested elections under the statute makes inapplicable a general statute providing for appeals in contested-election cases, and prevents an appeal in such cases.

Same — denial of appeal — constitutionality.

2. A statute denying an appeal in proceedings to contest a local-option election does not unconstitutionally deprive contestants of the privileges and immunities of citizens, nor of property without due process of law, nor of the equal protection of the laws.

Same — special legislation.

3. A statute denying an appeal in a proceeding to contest a local-option election when an appeal is allowed in a proceeding to contest other elections is not unconstitutional special legislation.

Same — final determination.

4. An order sustaining a demurrer to 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a petition to contest a local-option election is a determination of the merits, from which no appeal can be taken, under a statute providing that the trial court shall have final jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits of such cases.

(October 26, 1908.)

APPEAL by contestants from a judgment of the Du Page County Court sustaining a demurrer to a petition to contest a local-option election. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note. — Constitutionality of statute denying right of appeal from decision of courts in certain classes of cases.

This note is confined to statutes denying the right to appeal from the decision of courts of law in a designated class of cases, and excludes cases involving the constitutionality of statutes which fail to provide for an appeal from the decision of local or state boards or commissioners, which act without the intervention of a court of law.

The power to take away a right of appeal so as to affect a pending action or proceeding is not within the scope of this note.

Legislative right in general as to finality of judgments.

Where the right to appeal from a judgment of an inferior court to one of superior jurisdiction is not secured by the Constitution, the legislature may, in its discretion, make the decision of the inferior court final. People v. Fowler, 9 Cal. 85; Edwards v. Vandemack, 13 Ill. 633; Paducah v. Ragdale, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1057, 92 S. W. 13; Sullivan v. Haug, 82 Mich. 548, 10 L.R.A. 263, 46 N. W. 795; *Minneapolis v. In Nebraska the right to a review in the court of last resort is secured by the Constitution and Bill of Rights. State ex rel. Lincoln v. Babcock, 19 Neb. 239, 27 N. W. 98; Hurlburt v. Palmer, 39 Neb. 158, 57 N. W. 1019; School Dist. No. 6 v. Traver, 43 Neb. 524, 61 N. W. 720.

It was said in People v. Richmond, 16 Colo. 274, 28 Pac. 929, that "the citizen has no natural or inalienable right to a hearing

Where the effect of a new act is to amend the general statutes of the state upon the subject, by adding to those statutes new provisions, so as to create out of the general statutes and the new act a new law upon the subject, the new act is clearly amendatory of the old statutes, and as such is unconstitutional without complying with § 13, art. 4, of the Constitution.

other purposes, would make the act class legislation.

Messrs. David F. Matchett and John S. Goodwin, for appellees:

The county court had final jurisdiction of the proceeding under the statute, and the appeal is now improperly before this court. Dramshop act, § 19.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the election held in the city of Naperville, Du Page county, in April, 1908, the question was submitted to the voters of said in the supreme court. If the right to such a hearing exists, it must be deduced from some constitutional guaranty. . . . The declarations in § 6 of the Bill of Rights, 'that courts of justice shall be open to every person, and a speedy remedy afforded for every injury to person, property, or character; and that right and justice shall be administered without sale, denial, or delay',—simply bestow upon each individual the right to an intelligent, impartial, and speedy judicial hearing and determination of his grievances. They were not intended to confer the privilege of having each controversy tried by every court of the state.

. . . . The litigant cannot, as a matter of right, assert that he will come to this tribunal by appeal, for such appeals remain creatures of statute, and, in the absence thereof, do not exist. He cannot claim a vested right to bring his case to this court by writ of error; for, while this writ is in most cases a writ of right at the common law, it may by statute, unless the Constitution forbids, be limited or abolished altogether." Similar language was used by the court in United States ex rel. Brightwood R. Co. v. O'Neal, 10 App. D. C. 244.

And it was held in McCue v. Com. 103 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623, that a writ of error or appeal is not the right of one convicted of crime, and is no part of due process of law, as there is no absolute right thereto in civil or criminal cases.

So, a statute providing that writs of error "in all criminal cases not punishable with death shall be considered as writs of right, and issue of course; and in criminal cases punishable with death writs of error shall be considered as writs of grace, and shall not issue but by the order of the chancellor,"—is not a denial of due process of law in a case punishable by death. Andrews v. Swartz, 156 U. S. 272, 39 L. ed. 422, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 389.

A statute denying an appeal to persons convicted of certain misdemeanors in the police court of a designated city, when per- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sons convicted of similar misdemeanors in justice's court elsewhere in the state, under the same circumstances and conditions, would be permitted to appeal, does not deny the former the equal protection of the laws, where all persons within the jurisdiction of the same court have the same right to appeal. Sullivan v. Haug, supra. The court said: "No person has a constitutional right to a second trial, after having been duly convicted before a court of competent jurisdiction, by an appeal to another tribunal; neither is there an inherent right to appeal from a judgment of an inferior to a court of superior jurisdiction, for the purpose of securing a second trial upon the merits. The right to an appeal is and always has been statutory, and does not exist at common law. It is a remedy which the legislature may, in its discretion, grant or take away; and it may prescribe in what cases, and under what circumstances, and from what courts, appeals may be taken."

So, an act denying an appeal to the supreme court from a judgment granting a divorce violates a constitutional requirement that "final judgments in inferior courts may be brought by writ of error, or on appeal, into the supreme court in such manner as may be prescribed by law." Simpson v. Simpson, 25 Ark. 487.

And a constitutional provision granting appeals to all persons aggrieved by any order, sentence, or decree of the orphans' court to a designated court cannot be taken away by the legislature by providing for an appeal to a different court. Kitchell v. Beach, 35 N. J. Eq. 446.

A statute providing that both the law and facts shall be open to review in the supreme court, where the appellate court reverses a judgment without awarding a trial de novo, because its finding of the facts differs from that of the trial court, creates an unconstitutional discrimination between parties litigant, and denies equal protection of the laws, and confers special privileges, by permitting the appellee to have the facts re-city whether said city should become anti-saloon territory under the act of May 16, 1907, providing for the creation, by popular vote, of anti-saloon territory, and for the abolition, by like means, of territory so created. The city of Naperville consists of three wards, each of which constitutes a voting precinct. The result of this election, as declared by the city council acting on the returns made by the election judges, was 408 votes against the proposition submitted and 467 in favor of the city becoming anti-saloon territory. Within less than ten days after the election Henry E. Saylor, Albert Pringnitz, Mathias W. Sander, Samuel Wehrli, and Walter Weigand, legal voters of the city of Naperville, filed a bond for costs in the county court of Du Page county and a verified petition to contest the election upon the proposition submitted, on the following grounds: (1) Because of alleged fraudulent and illegal proclamations and returns in the first and third wards; (2) because of irregular and unlawful arrangement and construction of the polling places in said first and third wards; (3) because of the loss of one regular, officially indorsed ballot in the first ward; (4) because of the casting of illegal votes in favor of said proposition in the first and third wards sufficient in number to change the result of the election in the city; (5) because of fraud and misfeasance of the election officers in said first and third wards. The city of Naperville, as a municipality, was not made a party defendant.

The prayer for process and answer to the petition is as follows: "That summons herein issued out of this court, addressed to George C. Duel, the city clerk of said city of Naperville, Du Page county, Illinois, notifying said city clerk of the filing of this viewed if the judgment of the appellate court is against him, while the appellant has no such right if defeated. Hecker v. Illinois C. R. Co. 231 Ill. 574, 83 N. E. 456; Jones v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 231 Ill. 302, 121 Am. St. Rep. 313, 83 N. E. 215; Green v. Red Cross Medical Service Co. 232 Ill. 616, 83 N. E. 1081; Zolnowski v. Illinois Steel Co. 233 Ill. 299, 84 N. E. 225; Hackett v. Chicago City R. Co. 235 Ill. 116, 85 N. E. 320; Reinhardt v. Chicago Junction R. Co. 235 Ill. 576, 85 N. E. 605.

But, under constitutional authority to create an appellate court "from which appeals and writs of error shall lie to the supreme court in [certain enumerated cases], and in such other cases as may be provided by law," the legislature is vested with discretion to make the judgment of the appellate court conclusive upon all questions of fact. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 152 Ill. 59, 30 L.R.A. 33, 38 N. E. 773. And this right is recognized in People v. Fowler, supra; Fallon v. Johnson, 51 Iowa, 206, 1 N. W. 478; Hager v. Adams, 70 Iowa, 746, 30 N. W. 36; Fleshman v. McWhorter, supra.

Right of appeal dependent on amount.

In the absence of a constitutional restriction, the legislature may deny the right of appeal in cases wherein the amount involved does not exceed a designated sum. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Watkins, 157 Ind. 600, 62 N. E. 443; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 Ind. App. 367, 61 N. E. 595; Leavenworth Coal Co. v. Barber, 47 Kan. 29, 27 Pac. 114; Messenger v. Teagan, 106 Mich. 654, 64 N. W. 499; Tierney v. Dodge, 9 Minn. 166, Gil. 153; Moise v. Powell, 40 Neb. 671, 59 N. W. 79; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Headrick, 49 Neb. 286, 68 N. W. 489; Butterfield v. Rudde, 58 N. Y. 489; Chattanooga v. Keith, 115 Tenn. 588, 94 S. W. 62, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 859; Garcia v. Free, 31 Utah, 389, 88 Pac. 30.

of appeals in cases wherein the matter in controversy does not exceed $500 is authorized by a constitutional provision conferring such appellate jurisdiction on that court "as now, or may be, prescribed by law." Butterfield v. Rudde, supra.

So, an act denying the right of appeal where the judgment does not exceed a certain amount is not open to the objection of special or unequal legislation. Garcia v. Free, supra.

So, a municipal charter denying appeals in civil cases where the fine imposed does not exceed $10 is not prohibited by a constitutional provision that the jurisdiction of the supreme court "shall be appellate, under such restrictions and regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by law." Chattanooga v. Keith, supra.

And an act providing that all judgments of the county courts, on appeals from justices', mayors', or recorders' courts, when the judgment rendered, or the fine imposed, or the amount in controversy shall not exceed $100, exclusive of costs, shall be final, is authorized by a constitutional provision empowering the legislature to "increase, diminish, or change the civil and criminal jurisdiction of county courts." Gerald v. State, 4 Tex. App. 308.

So, an act denying the right to appeal to the supreme or appellate court in any civil case within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, except cases involving a question as to the validity of a franchise, or ordinance of a municipal corporation, or the constitutionality of a state or Federal statute, or the proper construction thereof, or of a right guaranteed by the state or Federal Constitution, does not violate a constitutional provision that "the supreme court shall have jurisdiction coextensive with the limits of the state in appeals and writs of error, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by law." Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Watkins, supra.

And a provision of the Bill of Rights that the courts shall be open to every person, petition, and directing him to appear in this court on behalf of said city of Naperville on the 5th day of May, A. D. 1908, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon, in the county court room in the courthouse in the city of Wheaton, in the county of Du Page and state of Illinois, then and there to answer this petition, in conformity with the statutes in such case made and provided." George C. Duel, city clerk of the city of Naperville, entered his appearance, as did eight other citizens and legal voters of said city, and filed a demurrer to the petition, setting out the following causes of demurrer: First, that neither the city of Naperville, Du Page county, Illinois, nor any other person, is made a defendant in or to the said petition; second, as to the matters and things contained in said bill wherein it is alleged that the polling places in the various precincts were not arranged in form as provided by law, the same and each and every one the allegations of said petition are wholly insufficient, because said petition does not allege that said illegal arrangement of the polling places resulted or in any manner tended to prevent a free and fair election as so arranged; third, because said petition is wholly insufficient to confer any jurisdiction on this court to grant the whole or any part of the relief prayed for by said petition. The county court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, to which ruling of the court the petitioners duly excepted and prayed and obtained an appeal to this court. The errors assigned and a speedy trial afforded for every injury, and right and justice shall be administered freely, and without purchase; completely, and without denial; speedily, and without delay,—is fully satisfied by a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction in which the right to a jury, in proper cases, as guaranteed by the Constitution, is afforded. Ibid.

A statute of Missouri, providing that there shall be an appeal from a final judgment of the circuit court to the supreme court, except in certain designated counties, wherein an appeal shall lie to the court of appeals, from whose decision an appeal shall lie to the supreme court only in cases where the amount in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds $2,500, or involves the construction of the Constitution of the state, or of the United States, and in some other enumerated special cases, does not contravene the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution, although a case involving a lesser amount, which originated in another county, would be appealable to the supreme court. Missouri v. Lewis (Bowman v. Lewis) 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. ed. 989. The court said that the 14th Amendment "could never have been intended to prevent a state from arranging and parceling out the jurisdiction of its several courts at its discretion. . . . It is the right of every state to establish such courts as it sees fit, and to prescribe their several jurisdictions as to territorial extent, subject-matter and amount, and the finality and effect of their decisions; provided it does not encroach upon the proper jurisdiction of the United States, and does not abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; and does not deprive any person of his rights without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, including the equal right to resort to the appropriate courts for redress. The last restriction as to the equal protection of the laws is not violated by any diversity in the jurisdiction of the several courts as to subject-matter, amount, or finality of decision, if all persons within the territorial limits of their respective jurisdictions have an equal right in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) like cases and under like circumstances to resort to them for redress."

But in Morton v. Gordon, Dallam (Tex.) 396, an act of the Congress of the Republic of Texas denying the right of appeal to the supreme court unless the amount in controversy exceeded $300 was held invalid, in the absence of express authority for its adoption, where the Constitution conferred appellate jurisdiction on the supreme court "co-extensive with the limits of the Republic."

The right to an appeal from a judgment involving less than a designated sum is denied by the constitutions of some states. Myers v. Mitchell, 20 La. Ann. 533; Cherry v. State, 4 Tex. App. 4; Penter v. Staight, 1 Wash. 365, 25 Pac. 469.

As affected by other mode of review.

An act conferring jurisdiction upon probate courts in matters pertaining to services rendered by agricultural laborers is not rendered unconstitutional by not providing for an appeal, where a different statute permits an appeal from the final judgment, decree, or order of the probate court. Thomas v. Bibb, 44 Ala. 721.

So, a municipal charter denying the right of appeal upon conviction before a justice of the peace for assault, where the judgment or fine imposed is less than $25, does not conflict with a constitutional provision giving the supreme court appellate jurisdiction in all cases of such character, as it does not deny the right to obtain a review by the writ of certiorari. Tierney v. Dodge, supra. The court said: An appeal is a statutory right, and may be granted or withheld in all or any class of cases which may be determined by the character of the proceeding or the amount of fine or judgment, as the limitation of such right operates equally upon all suitors in such court, and this is all that is required.

So, it was held in Moise v. Powell, supra, that an act denying an appeal to the district court where the case was tried by a jury, unless the amount involved exceeded $20, did not violate a constitutional provi-call in question the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Section 19 of the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 304), under which this election was held, after providing for a contest of such election by five legal voters of any political division in which an election shall have been held as provided for in that act, provides: "The county court shall have final jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits of such cases." Under the language of this statute, we are met with the question whether any appeal lies from the judgment of the county court to this court from a judgment rendered in a proceeding to contest an election held under the statute of 1907. This question is raised by appellees sion that "the right to be heard in all civil cases in a court of last resort, by appeal, error, or otherwise, shall not be denied;" as a person against whom such a judgment is rendered may obtain a review thereof by petition in error, such act merely depriving a litigant of one method of review, and leaving another adequate remedy open to him.

Nor does such act violate the provisions of the Bill of Rights prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law, as it does not deprive a litigant of a review of questions of law by petition in error. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Headrick, 49 Neb. 286, 68 N. W. 489.

Failure to provide for an appeal from an order of a magistrate ordering the destruction of intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept does not take property without due process of law, as the right to a review by error is not denied. Sothman v. State, 66 Neb. 302, 92 N. W. 303.

Denial of appeal in proceedings not according to common law.

As the right to a review of civil cases in the court of appeals is not a natural and inherent one, which cannot be taken away by the legislature, an act providing that the judgment of the supreme court in summary proceedings to recover possession of land shall be final, unless such court shall allow an appeal, is valid. People v. Fowler, 9 Cal. 85.

So, a statutory declaration that the decision of a court in a special or summary proceeding unknown to the common law, created to afford temporary relief, shall be final, is valid in the absence of constitutional restriction. Mau v. Stoner, 14 Wyo. 183, 83 Pac. 218.

So, an act providing that the decision of the circuit court in a contested election case shall be final does not contravene a constitutional provision that the supreme court shall have jurisdiction of certain enumerated cases, and "shall have appellate jurisdiction in all other cases," as a proceeding to contest an election is not a "case," within the meaning of the Constitution, but 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

in their brief, but is not discussed. It is discussed at some length by appellants in their reply brief. Since, in our views, this is a question of controlling importance, we regret that we have been compelled to investigate it without any brief on one side and with but little assistance from the one filed by the other. In this state the right of appeal in any case is purely statutory, with the possible exception of certain classes of cases enumerated in § 11 of article 6 of the Constitution of 1870, in which the right of appeal from the appellate to the supreme court in certain enumerated cases seems to be guaranteed by the Constitution. Section 123 of chapter 46 of Hurd's Revised Statutes of 1905 provides for appeals to be taken to the supreme court from merely a proceeding for a recanvass of the votes cast and the finding of the result. Moore v. Mayfield, 47 Ill. 167; People v. Smith, 51 Ill. 177.

But an act making the judgment of a justice of the peace final in certain actions not according to the course of the common law and expressly forbidding the allowance of appeal, certiorari, writ of error, or injunction, and declaring that the litigants shall abide the judgment, violates a constitutional provision vesting in the supreme court power to issue writs of certiorari, and to hear and determine the same. Ex parte Anthony, 5 Ark. 358.

So, it was held in St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Lux, 63 Ill. 523, that an act permitting the condemnation of land for a railway right of way by the circuit court, and making its jurisdiction final and conclusive, violated the provision of the Constitution of 1848 that the supreme court should have original jurisdiction in cases relating to the revenue, in mandamus and habeas corpus proceedings, and appellate jurisdiction in other cases; as such proceeding involves the question of damages in condemning land for such purpose, and is a contest between two parties as to what amount one shall pay for the use of the other's lands, and must be considered a "case" within the meaning of the Constitution.

And so an act authorizing the district judge to appoint a board of referees to pass upon claims and demands theretofore issued, by a provisional municipal government whose decision is to be affirmed by such court, and which makes no provision for an appeal, does not constitute due process of law to which every person, including the city government of the municipality subsequently formed, is entitled. Guthrie Nat. Bank v. McEl Hinney, 5 Okla. 107, 47 Pac. 1082.

An act declaring the decision of the circuit court to be final upon appeals to it from the orders of the board of police in opening section lines does not violate a constitutional provision conferring upon the high court of error and appeals "such jurisdiction as properly belongs to a court of error and appeals," which is not a limitacounty and circuit courts in all contested election cases, "in the same manner and upon like conditions as is provided by law for taking appeals in cases in chancery from the circuit courts." There is no provision in the act under which this election was held granting to either party a right of appeal. Appellants contend that an appeal lies under § 123 of the general election law. Whether § 123 of the general election law could be held to apply to an election held under this statute, in the absence tion upon the authority of the legislature to prohibit appeals in certain classes of cases. Dismukes v. Stokes, 41 Miss. 430.

In State Tax-Law Cases, 54 Mich. 350, 20 N. W. 493, Cooley, Ch. J., and Champlin, J., held that no principle of constitutional law was violated by an act declaring the decision of the circuit court in chancery in a proceeding by the state to foreclose liens upon land for nonpayment of taxes to be final on questions as to the admissibility of evidence. Campbell and Sherwood, JJ., dissented, on the ground that the right of appeal in a chancery cause could not be thus taken away.

The granting of the right to appeal to a court in a proceeding to annex territory to a city, to resident property owners of such territory, but not to nonresident property owners, is not a grant to any citizen or class of citizens of privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, do not equally belong to all citizens. Taggart v. Claypool, 145 Ind. 500, 32 L.R.A. 586, 42 N. E. 18.

Neither does such act violate the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, providing that "no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Ibid.

Finality of decisions pertaining to local improvements.

Statutes providing that an appeal shall lie from the decision of local boards, vested with the power of making public improvements, to a designated court, the decision of which shall be final, have been upheld in the absence of constitutional restrictions to the contrary. Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 58; People ex rel. Henberg v. Cohen, 219 Ill. 200, 76 N. E. 388; Dismukes v. Stokes, supra, overruling Yalabusha County v. Carbry, 3 Smedes & M. 529; McAllister v. Albion Plank Road Co. 10 N. Y. 353; New York C. R. Co. v. Marvin, 11 N. Y. 276; Re Canal & Water Streets, 12 N. Y. 406; Re Palmer, 40 N. Y. 561; People ex rel. Grissler v. Fowler, 55 N. Y. 675; Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 110, rehearing denied in 44 Or. 160, 75 Pac. 222; Mau v. Stoner, supra.

So, a provision of a city charter permitting an appeal from an assessment for public improvements to the circuit court, and making the latter's decision final, does not contravene a constitutional provision that "all judicial power, authority, and jurisdiction not vested by this Constitution or by laws consistent therewith exclusively in some other court shall belong to the circuit courts; and they shall have appellate jurisdiction and supervisory control over the county courts and all other inferior 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) courts;" as the right of appeal is wholly statutory, and, unless expressly secured by the Constitution and such constitutional provisions, does not confer such right. Kadderly v. Portland, supra.

And an act prohibiting appeals from the court of general term to the court of appeals in matters pertaining to assessments for local improvements is not unconstitutional, even as to appeals pending at the time of its passage which must be dismissed. Re Palmer, 40 N. Y. 561.

But an act giving appeal to the county court from the decision of commissioners in erecting and establishing highways, and making the decisions of that court final, violates a constitutional provision conferring appellate jurisdiction in all cases upon the supreme court, as the right to an appeal is a constitutional one which must be allowed when claimed. Schlattweiler v. St. Clair County, 63 Ill. 449, overruling Coon v. Mason County, 22 Ill. 666; Marion County v. Harper, 44 Ill. 482.

Effect of failure to provide for an appeal.

The failure of an act empowering magistrates to issue warrants for the destruction of intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept, which is of a criminal nature, to provide for an appeal from such order, does not violate a constitutional guaranty of "the right to be heard in all civil cases in a court of last resort, by appeal, error, or otherwise," which is applicable to civil cases only. Sothman v. State, 66 Neb. 302, 92 N. W. 303.

So, the failure to provide for an appeal from an order removing a cause to another court does not render unconstitutional a statute providing that, when the plaintiff is entitled to some relief, but not in the court in which he has brought his action, the cause may, in the discretion of the court, be removed to the proper tribunal, where such amendments may be made as may be necessary to a hearing of the case according to its practice. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Schall, 96 Md. 225, 61 L.R.A. 300, 53 Ati. 925.

But, an act providing that certain defaults of overseers of highways shall be misdemeanors and triable by justices of the peace, which does not provide for an appeal upon conviction, violates a constitutional requirement that the right of appeal shall be secured in all cases tried by justices of the peace. Tims v. State, 26 Ala. 165. And this decision was followed in Ex parte Houghton, 38 Ala. 570, declaring unconstitutional an act conferring jurisdiction in vagrancy cases upon justices of the peace, and not providing for an appeal upon conviction.

of any provision in the law of 1907 in relation to such appeal, is not involved; since in our view the language already quoted from § 19 must be held to take elections held under said act out of the operation of said § 123. The provision that the county court shall have "final jurisdiction" to hear and determine the merits of such cases must, we think, be construed as a denial of the right to an appeal from the judgment of the county court in contests arising under this statute. Jurisdiction is the power vested by the law in a tribunal to hear and determine causes properly coming before such tribunal. "Final" means "last; conclusive; pertaining to the end." Bouvier's Law Dict. By conferring upon the county court "final jurisdiction," the jurisdiction of all other courts subsequent to the determination in the county court is ex vi termini excluded.

The case of Lampson v. Platt, 1 Iowa, 558, is an authority for the construction which we place on this statute. In that case § 12 of an act of the legislature of the state of Iowa (Laws 1854-55, p. 231, chap. 156), under which the proceeding was had, provided "that any person feeling aggrieved by the decision of the county judge, under the 9th section of this act may appeal therefrom to the district court of the proper county, which shall have final jurisdiction over the matter and shall make such decision in the premises as justice and equity may require." An appeal was prosecuted from the district court to the supreme court of Iowa, and, in holding that no appeal could be taken from the judgment of the district court, the supreme court of Iowa, on page 558 of 1 Iowa, uses this language: "The language of the statute is not that such district court shall have power, in such cases, to enter final judgment, but that it shall have final jurisdiction. If the term 'final judgment' had been used, the right to appeal, in view of the general provisions of the Code, could scarcely be questioned. Between judgment and jurisdiction there is, however, a clear distinction. The one is the decision or the law given by the court as the result of proceedings therein instituted; the other has reference to the power conferred to take cognizance of and determine causes according to law, and to carry the same into execution." That court, in dismissing the appeal, made the further remark that "to our minds, the language of the law can scarcely admit of two interpretations." In Coon v. Mason County, 22 Ill. 666, this court construed a provision in § 38 of chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of 1845, providing that "either party may appeal to the circuit court, where, the case being fully heard, such judgment or order shall be made thereon as the court shall deem right and which shall be a final decision," as conferring upon the circuit court the power to finally determine the cause. This court there said: "We are of the opinion that the legislature intended to prohibit the prosecution of a writ of error as well as an appeal." Moore v. Mayfield, 47 Ill. 167, was an election contest. The statute then in force provided that the contest should be heard, in the first instance, by three justices of the peace, and allowed an appeal from the decision of the three justices to the circuit court under a provision that "the decision of which court shall be final." Rev. Stat. 1845, chap. 37, § 49. It was there held that the judgment of the circuit court was final, and the writ of error was dismissed. See Loomis v. Hodson, 224 Ill. 147, 79 N. E. 590.

Appellants contend that to construe this act as denying an appeal would be to single out a contest of an election held under said act from a contest of an election held for any other purpose, and that to do so would render the act unconstitutional, as being contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution and in violation of § 22 of article 4 of the Constitution of this state. The particular part of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution which is supposed to be violated by the construction we have placed upon this statute reads as follows: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Appellants have no privileges or immunities which are abridged by denying them a right of appeal in this case, nor are they deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Even if it could be said that a proceeding to contest an election held for the purpose of determining whether a municipality should or should not become anti-saloon territory in some undefinable way involved the life, liberty, or property of the particular citizens who, availing themselves of the statutory privilege, take the initiative in bringing about such contest, the fact that the legislature has seen proper to withhold the right of appeal would not be a deprivation of such constitutional right without due process of law. "One hearing," the Supreme Court of the United States has said, "if ample before judgment, satisfies the demand of the Constitution in this respect. . . . If a single hearing is not due process, doubling it will not make it so." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup Ct.

Rep. 1114. In the case above cited Mr. Justice Brewer uses language which seems to us applicable to the other contention of appellants in this case. On page 427 of 154 U. S., the learned justice said: "The power of a state to make classifications in judicial or administrative proceedings carries with it the right to make such a classification as will give to parties belonging to one class two hearings before their rights are finally determined, and to parties belonging to a different class only a single hearing." The decision above cited appears to be a sufficient answer to appellants' views, not only as to the point made that the statute as thus construed violates the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, but also as to the other contention that the act is special legislation within the meaning of § 22 of article 4 of the Constitution of Illinois. This court has held in many cases that it is not necessary that a law shall apply to all the people of the state under this clause of our Constitution. Where a class is composed of persons possessing in common some disability, attribute, or qualification, or are under some conditions marking them as proper objects in whom to vest the specific rights granted unto them, the legislature may pass a law applicable only to such class. Vogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339, 30 L.R.A. 491, 42 N. E. 386. A law is general, not because it embraces all of the governed, but because it may do so when they occupy the same position as those who are embraced in its terms. Hawthorn v. People, 109 Ill. 302, 50 Am. Rep. 610. The legislature, in adopting the law granting the right to determine by vote whether a political subdivision shall become or shall continue to be anti-saloon territory, has seen proper to differentiate in several particulars the procedure for contesting such elections from the corresponding provisions found in the general election law. Thus it is provided in § 117 of the general election law that any five electors may contest an election upon any subject which may be by law submitted to a vote of the people of a county upon filing a petition in the circuit court within thirty days after the result of the election shall be determined. In a contest, for instance, of an election for the removal of a county seat, any five electors may make such contest. In respect to the number and qualifications of those who may contest, this section is similar to § 19 of the act of 1907, but in other respects there are wide differences. Under the general election law the contest is in the circuit court, while under the law of 1907 it is in the county court. Under the general law, the petitioners have thirty days in which to file the petition, while under this special statute it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

must be filed in ten days; and, under the general law, the petitioners are not required to give a bond for costs, while, under the new act, a bond for costs must be filed by the petitioners before filing their petition. Besides these differences, the legislature, for reasons which it deemed sufficient, has seen proper to provide for appeals from decisions in all contested election cases under the general law, while as to contests of election under the law of 1907 it has conferred final jurisdiction upon the county court. In doing so the legislature has exercised its power to determine that special elections upon this particular subject shall constitute a special class, which are subject to all the provisions of the statute under which they are conducted. The act in question is not open to the constitutional objections urged against it.

There being no authority of law for taking an appeal in this case, the appeal must be dismissed.

Divorce — antenuptial contract.

Acceptance, by a wife, of a sum allowed her by a decree of divorce in lieu of dower, bars her rights under an antenuptial contract which provides for payment to her, at her husband's death, of a certain sum of money in lieu of dower.

Note. — In numerous cases the question is raised whether or not any provision in lieu of dower in a decree of divorce is valid, and the courts are not harmonious upon the question. But, assuming that such a provision is valid, LONG v. BARTON presents the further question of the effect of such a provision, or rather of the acceptance of such a provision, upon an antenuptial settlement made in lieu of dower; in other words, whether an acceptance of a provision in lieu of dower would revoke something else provided in lieu of dower.

Jordan v. Clark, supra.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the appellate court for the third district reversing, without remanding, a judgment of the circuit court of Vermilion county.

The facts, which are not in dispute, are as follows: On October 1, 1901, appellant, Josephine Long, and Philip H. Barton, in contemplation of a marriage thereafter to be celebrated between them, entered into the following antenuptial contract:

Know all men by these presents, that I, Philip H. Barton, of Danville, Vermilion county, Illinois, hereinafter known as the party of the first part, and Miss Tonie Long, of the city of Danville, county of Vermilion, state of Illinois, hereinafter known as the party of the second part, witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the second party being joined with the first party in wedlock, and after said marriage said first party hereby agrees that said second party shall after his death, in lieu of dower, have the sum of $5,000, to be paid out of the estate of the said first party after all just debts and funeral expenses of the said first party have been paid. Second party agrees, in consideration of said $5,000 to be paid as above recited, to relinquish and waive all her dower rights of the estate of the said first party that may accrue to her by reason of the marriage of the said first party to the said second party under the laws and statutes of the state of Illinois. Witness our hands and seals this first day of October, 1901.

Philip H. Barton. [Seal.]
Tonie Long. [Seal.]

On the day following the execution of this contract the parties thereto were married. They lived together as husband and wife until 1904, when appellant obtained a divorce from her husband in the circuit court of Vermilion county on the charge of extreme and repeated cruelty. By the decree appellant was allowed $2,000 as a gross sum in full of all of her claim in and to the property of her husband. The payment of the $2,000 to appellant was directed to be made upon the execution and delivery to her husband of a quitclaim deed releasing all her interest in the real estate of her said husband. It was further provided in said decree: "The payment of the said sum of $2,000 by defendant to complainant shall also be considered as in lieu of and in full satisfaction of complainant's contingent right of dower and all other rights in the lands and tenements of defendant now owned by him and by him hereafter acquired." The appellant accepted the $2,000 awarded her by the decree. Philip H. Barton died testate, and appellees, John M. Barton and Charles L. English, were appointed executors of his will. Appellant, claiming that she was entitled to receive the $5,000 named in the antenuptial contract, filed a claim against the estate of Philip H. Barton for that sum. The county court of Vermilion county allowed said claim, and, upon an appeal to the circuit court by the executors, the same result was reached. The appellate court, as already indicated, reversed the judgment of the circuit court and refused to remand the cause, and it is this latter judgment that appellant seeks to have reviewed by this appeal.

By her acceptance of the $2,000 under the provisions of the divorce decree, appellant must be held to have waived her right to dower in her husband's lands. The antenuptial contract is not an unconditional promise to pay $5,000, but it is to be paid in lieu of dower. If appellant had died before her husband, all rights under the antenuptial contract would have been extinguished. The effect of the antenuptial contract was to substitute a sum of money for appellant's right of dower in her husband's land. Anything that would extinguish her right of dower would extinguish that which, by agreement, was substituted in its place. This rule has been recognized in the following decisions of this court: Clarke v. Lott, 11 Ill. 105; Jordan v. Clark, 81 Ill. 465; Lennahan v. O'Keefe, 107 Ill. 620; Adams v. Storey, 135 Ill. 448, 11 L.R.A. 790, 25 Am. St. Rep. 392, 26 N. E. 582. In the last case cited it was held that the right to dower was barred by an annuity given for life in a divorce decree which makes the annuity a lien and charge upon the husband's real estate, where the wife has taken her support and maintenance under the decree. Appellant, having accepted the provisions made for her by the decree in lieu of dower, must be held to have abandoned all claim to that which, under the contract, represented her dower.

The judgment of the Appellate Court for the Third District is affirmed.

(October 26, 1908.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin the copying of the books containing the abstracts of title to real estate in Cook county. Affirmed.

Statement by Vickers, J.:

The Chicago Title & Trust Company, in its capacity of a taxpayer of Cook county, filed a bill against Jerome J. Danforth, the Abstract Construction Company, the Real Estate Title & Trust Company, Abel Davis, as recorder of Cook county, and the county of Cook, to enjoin the three first-named defendants from copying the abstract books or tract indices belonging to Cook county, and to enjoin the last-named two defendants from permitting the other defendants to make any such copies, either verbatim or substantial. The bill also prayed for a return to the county of Cook of all such copies of said books as may have been made, and for an accounting for any compensation that may have been received for the making of abstracts of title from the copies of the abstract books or tract indices which may have wrongfully come into the hands of the three defendants first above named. All of the defendants below, other than the county of Cook and the recorder, filed a general demurrer to the bill in its amended form, which was sustained by the circuit court and the bill dismissed for want of equity. The recorder and Cook county answered the bill. The former admits all of the allegations of the bill, and joins in the prayer for relief, and the latter, by its answer, admits the substance of the bill, but denies that the complainant is entitled to any relief. Upon an appeal from a decree dismissing the bill for want of equity, the appellate court for the first district affirmed the decree below. This appeal is prosecuted by the complainant below from the judgment of affirmance in the appellate court. From the averments of the amended bill, it appears that the recorder of Cook county caused to be made, at the expense of the county, a set of abstract books, and that the recorder used such abstract books in supplying the public with abstracts of land titles in that county, in accordance with the provisions of, and for the compensation provided in, "An Act to Authorize Recorders of Deeds in Counties where Recorders of Deeds are Elected to Keep Abstract Books, Make Abstracts, and Fixing the Fees and Compensation Therefor" approved June 16, 1887, in force July 1, 1887. The bill sets out in detail when and how these abstract books were made, and the cost of the same to the county. It appears, further, from the bill, that the Abstract Construction Company is a corporation organized in 1904, with a capital stock of $200,000, and that Jerome J. Danforth is president of said company; that said company has been engaged in copying the abstract books for something over a year; that, a short time before the filing of the bill, the Real Estate Title & Trust Company, another corporation, was organized, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, and that the Abstract Construction Company has assigned and transferred to the Real Estate Title & Trust Company all of the abstract books, tract indices, and other information which had been compiled by the Abstract Construction Company from the abstract books belonging to Cook county. The bill is framed on the theory that a private person or corporation engaged in the abstract business has no legal right to copy the abstract books belonging to the county, for the purpose of making and selling abstracts to its customers in competition with the recorder. Appellant's contention is that the abstract books are a species of public property, and that the copying of such books by a private abstract company for use in its business is such a misappropriation of public property as will give a taxpayer standing in a court of equity to prevent by injunction. Appellees' contention is that the abstract books are public records, and that any person has the legal right to inspect such records, and make copies or memoranda thereof, and that, conceding that the books themselves are public property, the mere making of copies from the books is not in any sense an appropriation of the property itself; and, finally, appellees contend that appellant has no such interest, by virtue of being a taxpayer, as will enable it to maintain this bill.

Mr. Charles T. Farson in support of a petition for rehearing on behalf of Abel Davis, recorder.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The labor of the court has been greatly increased in this case by the unnecessary length of the briefs counsel have seen fit to file. There are no questions of fact involved, and the questions of law are not more difficult than the majority of questions with which this court is required to deal, yet appellant has filed a brief of more than 200 pages, and appellees have filed one equally as large. In addition to the main briefs, appellant has filed a reply brief consisting of 77 pages, which is largely made up of a mere reiteration of what is contained in its main brief. Thorough and painstaking investigation is in all cases to be encouraged and commended, and, when properly and intelligently carried on, it ought to result in the elimination of collateral and immaterial matters, and the presentation of the controlling questions involved so clearly that they can be readily decided. The mistake counsel in this case have made is in attempting to make a compilation of all the law that can be found upon the subjects treated. The result of their efforts is that they have gotten together the material out of which proper briefs and arguments might have been constructed, leaving the court to cull, out of the nearly 500 pages of printed matter, such arguments and authorities as are helpful in determining the question involved. If the briefs in this case had been limited to one third their length, they would have been more useful and less burdensome to the court.

The principal question presented in this record is the proper construction to be given to the statutes passed in 1887 in relation to the keeping of abstract books by recorders. Before coming directly to the acts of 1887, it is important to have before us the state of the law prior to the enactments in question. In the revision of our statutes of 1874 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1905, chap. 115), the legislature passed an act to revise the law in relation to recorders, § 12 of which provided that the recorder shall keep an entry book, a grantors' index, a grantees' index, and an index to each book of records. The fifth clause of said § 12 reads as follows: "When required by the county board, an abstract book, which shall show by tracts every conveyance or encumbrance recorded, the date of the instrument, time of filing the same, the book and page where the same is recorded; which book shall be so kept as to show a true chain of title to each tract and the encumbrances thereon, as shown by the records of his office." It will be noted that there are several defects in clause 5 above quoted, the most important of which is that the statute only authorizes the keeping of abstract books showing a chain of title as "shown by the records of his office." The act made no provision for keeping any records of judgment liens, execution and tax sales, and other judicial proceedings which are essential to a complete abstract. The act not only failed to define the duties and fix the compensation for the performance thereof, but it left the right of the public to inspect and use such books to be determined without the aid of legislation. These defects in the law of 1874 no doubt led the legislature in 1887 to pass an act, entitled "An Act to Amend the Act of 1874 by Adding Thereto Another Section," which is found as § 21 of chapter 115 of Hurd's Revised Statutes of 1905, and is as follows: "All records, indices, abstract and other books kept in the office of any recorder, and all instruments filed for record therein, shall, during office hours, be open for public inspection and examination; and all persons shall have free access for inspection and examination to such records, indices, books, and instruments which the recorders shall be bound to exhibit to those who wish to inspect or examine the same; and all persons shall have the right to take memoranda and abstracts thereof without fee or reward." The above act was approved May 31, 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 258), and in force July 1, 1887.

At the same session of the legislature another act was passed, entitled "An Act to Authorize Recorders of Deeds in Counties where Recorders of Deeds are Elected to Keep Abstract Books to Make Abstracts of Title, and Fixing the Fees and Compensation Thereof," which was approved June 16, 1887, and in force July 1, 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 256). This act makes it the duty of the recorder, in a county where the recorder is elected, to keep abstract books showing all conveyances and encumbrances and judicial proceedings affecting the title to real estate, indices to tax-sale books, forfeiture records, and, in short, a complete set of books, so as to enable the recorder to furnish perfect abstracts of title to real estate. The act fixes the fees that the recorder shall charge for abstracts, and requires him to give a bond in the sum of $20,000, conditioned to secure the accuracy and correctness of any and all such abstracts as he might make, to indemnify any and all persons purchasing abstracts from the recorder for loss or damage which they might sustain by reason of any errors, mistakes, or omissions in such abstracts. A proviso was added to § 1 of this act, as follows: "Provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed to empower the recorder to prevent the public from examining and taking memoranda from all records and instruments filed for record, indices and other books in his official custody; but it shall be his duty at all times, when his office is or is required by law to be open, to allow all persons without fee or reward to examine and take memoranda from the same." This act was amended in 1903 by the addition of two new sections (Laws 1903, p. 291), one of which reduced the amount of the bond required to be given by the recorder from $20,000 to $10,000, and provided that the bond was to be for the indemnity of the county, to reimburse the county for any loss or damage which the county might be required to pay by reason of errors or omissions of the recorder in any abstract that he might make. This section made the county liable directly to parties injured or damaged through errors, mistakes, or omissions of the recorder in making abstracts. The other added section provided for setting apart 5 per cent of all fees received by the recorder for abstracts, in a special indemnity fund, until such fund should reach the sum of $100,000, when the payments thereto were to be reduced to 2½ per cent and continue at the rate of 2½ per cent as long as said fund remained $100,000 or more, and, whenever it should fall below said sum, the payments at the rate of 5 per cent should be resumed. This fund was required to be paid to the county treasurer, who was to invest such fund in United States, state, county, or municipal bonds, and report annually the amount of interest received; and it was provided that said fund should be held to satisfy judgments obtained against the county for loss or damage, as aforesaid, and the payment thereof was to be made only upon the order of the county board.

The main contention of the parties is whether, under the law, a private abstract company has the right to make up a set of abstract books from the data obtained from the abstract books of the recorder. In the view that we take of this controversy it is not necessary to resort to common-law authorities or analogies, since it is one to be determined exclusively under the statutes above referred to. In the outset it is to be observed that the act of June 16, 1887, does not attempt to create a new office, but the duty in relation to keeping abstract books and making abstracts of title is added to the duties of the recorder. Original abstract books, whether made by the recorder or by a private individual, must be made from an examination of the original records kept in the various public offices in the county. Appellant admits, both in its bill and briefs, that any private person or corporation desiring to do so may make a set of abstract books from the original sources of information. In its bill appellant avers that "it is perfectly practicable to make up from the records of instruments, and court and other records, a complete set of such abstract books or tract indices, in the same manner and by the same methods that the said recorder's abstract books have been made up, and every subsisting set of such abstract books or tract indices, whether in public or private hands, excepting those of defendants hereinafter named, have been so made up." It is conceded that the expense of making up a set of abstract books from the original sources of information would be five times the amount that it would cost to make such abstract books from the compiled data of the records. The supposed injury which is sought to be prevented by the injunction is the loss to the county in revenue which may result from competition if appellants are permitted to go into the abstract business with books made by copying those kept by the recorder. The logic of appellant's contention is that the recorder should enjoy a monopoly of the abstract business in Cook county, excepting in so far as his competitors might divide the business by the use of books made from the original records. There is no averment in the bill from which it may be assumed that, if appellees are enjoined from the use of the abstract books, they will not resort to the original records and make such abstract books therefrom. In fact, the bill shows that there are other sets of abstract books, whether few or many, that are in use in Cook county, and have thus been made from the original records. Presumably the only effect of granting the injunction in this case would be to compel appellees to resort to the original records, instead of the abstract books, for their material. The increased cost of compiling abstract books from the original records, which is suggested in the bill, would have no effect upon the competition with the recorder's office after such books were completed. If it had any effect, it would tend to increase the efforts of such competing abstract company, for the reason, upon appellant's showing here, it would have five times as much capital invested in its abstract plant, and therefore under the necessity of doing a larger business in order to make a profit. If appellant desired to increase the revenue of the recorder's office for the making of abstracts, then logically it ought to file a bill to enjoin all persons from making abstract books from the original records. If such a bill could be maintained, then the monopoly of the recorder would ultimately become complete, and that office would have entire control over the business of furnishing all abstracts of title; but, confessedly, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this cannot be done. The right of any person to inspect and make memoranda from the original records, with a view of engaging in the furnishing of abstracts of title for compensation, is, as already indicated, an admitted fact upon the record of this case. Is there, then, any warrant in law for discriminating between the public records which the recorder keeps in connection with his abstract business and the original records from which these books were made?

Until the passage of the act of May 31, 1887, there was no statute purporting to give any person the right to examine any of the records in the recorder's office. The right existing prior to that time was only the right guaranteed by the common law. The extent and limitation of this right is not involved here. The act above referred to provides that "all records, indices, abstract and other books kept in the office of any recorder, and all instruments filed for record therein, . . . the recorders shall be bound to exhibit to those who wish to inspect or examine the same; and all persons shall have the right to take memoranda and abstracts thereof, without fee or reward." This statute enlarged the common-law right by extending it to all persons, regardless of whether such persons had a special interest, which was required as a basis of the right at common law. It will be noted that by this statute the right to inspect, examine, and take memoranda and abstracts therefrom extends to all the public records in the recorder's office, including the abstract and other books. We are wholly unable to differentiate between the right to inspect and examine and take memoranda and abstracts from abstract books and the other records required by law to be kept in the recorders' office. There is as much reason for granting the one as the other, and we are unable to see how it can be said, as appellant contends, that the law will freely permit the inspection and examination of all public records kept by the recorder, save and except only one particular record known as the "abstract book," and yet such appears to be the logic of appellant's bill.

The right to inspect records and make memoranda therefrom is limited to such records as the recorder is required by law to keep and as to these the right must necessarily be exercised subject to such reasonable regulations as the recorder sees proper to make for the orderly government of his office. There is no charge that appellees are not conforming to such regulations, if any have been made. In the view that we take of this case appellees are simply exercising the rights which they have under the statute of May 31, 1887, and the proviso in the act of June 10, 1887. This view of the case renders it wholly unnecessary to discuss the right of appellant, in its capacity of taxpayer, to file this bill. On this question we do not find it necessary to express any opinion.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Carter, J., specially concurring:

I agree with the conclusion, but not in all that is said in the opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

G. H. FRANCE, Admr., etc., of Jessie K. Little, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

FLORENCE MUNRO et al.

(— Iowa, —, 115 N. W. 577.)

Usury — broker's commission.

1. A usurious loan, by one, of money in his possession belonging to another, which he handles entirely according to his own judgment, cannot be freed from the usurious taint whether he bears to the owner the Case Note. — Commissions charged borrower by lender's agent as usury.

The reported cases on this subject are not altogether in harmony. By the great weight of authority such commissions render the transaction usurious only when the lender participates in them, or has knowledge actual or constructive that his agent is making such charge. The lender may ratify his agent's acts; but it is generally held that bringing suit on a note in which the agent charged the borrower a commission does not constitute such ratification. Some cases, however, go farther, and hold the transaction usurious, even though knowledge of the agent's acts is not brought home to the lender.

The cases are by no means definite and clear as to just what charges the agent may, with the lender's knowledge and consent, make against the borrower without rendering the transaction usurious.

It has been held that a loan is not rendered usurious by the lender's agent charging the borrower, for his own benefit, a commission or bonus for procuring the loan, in excess of the highest legal rate of interest, where the commission was charged without the lender's knowledge or consent, and there were no circumstances to charge him with such knowledge; the court saying that, in making such charge, the agent was acting in his own individual capacity, for it will not be presumed that the lender authorized his agent to do an illegal act. This rule was adopted by a divided court in Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, 78 Am. Dec. 137, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

relation of debtor or that of attorney, by the device of calling himself in the papers the agent of the borrower, and designating the excess over legal interest commission for his services.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in his favor for a less amount than demanded in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Weaver, J.:

Action in equity to recover upon a promissory note and to foreclose a chattel mortgage. The defendants admitted the note, alleged usury in the consideration therefor, and pleaded partial payment. The trial court sustained the plea of usury, and after applying payments made, found plaintiff entitled to recover the remainder of $50.50, and to a foreclosure of the mortgage to that extent. In Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446, the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission for procuring the loan in excess of the legal rate of interest, of which charge the lender never knew, nor did he authorize it, although the agent professed to take the commission for his principal, the court holding that the fact that the agent professed to act for the lender in exacting the commission did not render the transaction usurious if the lender did not know of his agent's acts at the time the loan was made, and did not ratify the same.

In Philips v. Mackellar, 92 N. Y. 34, plaintiff sought to recover on a bond and mortgage to which the defense of usury was pleaded, in that a premium, in addition to the legal rate of interest, was given to plaintiff's attorney and by him paid to the mortgagee; but it further appeared that the alleged premium was taken by the mortgagee, as he understood, because the security was not a first loan on the property in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) question; and, in reversing a judgment for the defendant, the court said that, as the contract was made by the plaintiffs attorney, the defense of usury was not established till the plaintiff was shown to have known or consented to his attorney's acts, or to have ratified the same.

In Jordan v. Humphrey, 31 Minn. 495, 18 N. W. 460, the assignee of the purchaser of property under a foreclosure sale sought to enjoin the mortgagor in possession from committing waste during the time allowed for redemption, the defense being usury in that the mortgagee's agent reserved a fee for searching title and a bonus for procuring the loan, the evidence seeming to show that the mortgagee never knew of, or consented to, such charge; and, in sending the case back for a new trial, the court said: "A bonus thus taken out by agents for their own benefit, and without any collusion with the lender, who neither authorizes nor ratifies the act, nor derives any benefit from it, is not presumptively a cover for usury on his part, and does not make the loan usurious. And receiving the mortgage and attempting to enforce it for the amount actually loaned, with lawful interest, does not amount to a ratification."

A transaction is rendered usurious in which the lender's agent charges the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest with the lender's knowledge, or under circumstances making him chargeable with such knowledge. Demarest v. Vandenberg, 41 N. J. Eq. 63, 3 Atl. 69 (in which the lender knew that his agent charged the commission, but received no part of it); Pfenning v. Scholer, 43 N. J. Eq. 15, 10 Atl. 833; Brown v. Brown, 38 S. C. 173, 17 S. E. 452 (in which the loan was negotiated by the general agent of the lender); Land Mortg. Invest. & Agency Co. v. Gillan, 49 S. C. 345, 26 S. E. 990; New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Gay, 33 Fed. 636 (writ of error dismissed in 145 U. S. 123, 36 L. ed. 646, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 815); Vahlberg v. Keaton, 51 Ark. 534, 4 L.R.A. 402, 14 Am. St. Rep. 73, 11 S. W. 878.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of the loan in controversy the appellees, husband and wife, were in straitened circumstances, their household furniture and other personal property being encumbered by a mortgage, which was about to be foreclosed. Mrs. Munro applied for advice or assistance to their neighbor, Judge Miller, and he introduced her to the plaintiff, a money lender and broker. There appear to have been two interviews between the parties, the first being on August 10,

The circumstances necessary to charge the lender with knowledge of his agent's acts is a question of fact, and each case must be decided on its own merits.

In Wyeth v. Braniff, 84 N. Y. 628, it was held, in an action to set aside an assignment of a judgment to foreclose a mortgage, and also a sale thereunder, that the assignment, and consequently the sale, were usurious, inasmuch as the assignment was made in consideration that the mortgagor pay to the assignee's agent a bonus or commission for procuring payment of the mortgage debt; the court saying that, as there was no evidence that the assignee did not know of the commission, or that he did not participate in the same, he would be charged with his agent's acts. This case distinguishes the case of Condit v. Baldwin, supra.

In Bliven v. Lydecker, 130 N. Y. 102, 28 N. E. 625, reversing 55 Hun, 171, 7 N. Y. Supp. 867, a husband, as agent of his wife, loaned money on mortgage security, exacting of the borrower a bonus in excess of the legal rate of interest, apparently negotiating the loan for himself, though the mortgage was taken in the wife's name, and it seems the wife, who received the benefits of the transaction from year to year, was the real lender. The court held the transaction usurious, for, by accepting the benefits of the loan for so long, the wife was deemed to have ratified her agent's acts, and was charged therewith.

In Braine v. Rosswoog, 13 App. Div. 249, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1098 (appeal dismissed in 153 N. Y. 647, 47 N. E. 1105), it was held, where the lender's father acted as her agent, and charged the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest, that the transaction was usurious, although the borrower signed certain papers acknowledging that she retained the father as her agent; it further appearing that the father and daughter lived in the same house, the commissions going to support them both, so that the whole transaction showed a mere cover for usury.

2 Atl. 369, a borrower paid to the lender's son, who also acted as agent of his father, one fourth the sum loaned, as a commission for procuring it; and the court, in following the general rule, said, the facts that the lender left the room just as the loan was about to be completed, the money paid, and securities transferred, and, as soon as he was out of sight, the commissions were paid to the son, would tend to show that the father did not want to know of the commissions; and he would be charged with knowledge of the same.

In McFarland v. Carr, 16 Wis. 259, it was held, where the lender's agent loaned money to a borrower on mortgage security, charging the borrower a certain bonus or commission for his services in obtaining the loan, which, in addition to the interest charged, made the rate in excess of the legal one, that the transaction was usurious; the inference from the existing circumstances seeming to be that the lender knew of his agent's acts, inasmuch as the agent testified that he always made loans under the direction of his principal, and, in this case, that the lender sent the money especially for this borrower.

In Dayton v. Dearholt, 85 Wis. 151, 55 N. W. 147, where the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission or bonus for procuring the loan in excess of the legal rate of interest, the court held that a finding of usury was proper; that the agency existing between the parties, being of long standing, together with their intimate relations, left little doubt that the lender knew of the commissions charged; it further appearing that there was evidence from which the jury might have found that the agent was the real lender.

In Sherwood v. Roundtree, 32 Fed. 113, it was held that the lender would be charged with knowledge of his agent's acts, and the transaction be held usurious, inasmuch as the business relations had existed between them for a long time.

In Meers v. Stevens, 106 Ill. 549, it was held, where the son, as agent of his father, loaned money to a borrower, charging a com-

1904, and the second on the following day, when the transaction was consummated. At first the plaintiff made some objection to the character of the security offered, but finally agreed to loan the appellees the sum of $350. In closing the deal appellant prepared, and the appellees executed at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, three separate documents. The first of these was the statement of the desire of appellees to procure a loan of $363.50 on certain specified security, which statement was followed by a clause in the following form: "I authorize G. H. France, as agent for me, to negotiate for said loan, for which I agree to pay $13.50 cash in hands as commission and interest. The lawful contract rate of interest that my note bears for the payee above described time is to first be taken from the $13.50 above described, and the remaining amount to go to G. H. France, my authorized agent, as commission or pay for his services for procuring the loan for me for said time, for examining the securities, the records of the county, writing the papers, collecting and paying over the money, and such additional work and trouble as he is required to do in procuring said loan."

The next paper was a promissory note for the sum of $363.50, payable one month after date to J. K. Little, or bearer, with interest at 8 per cent per annum at appellant's office in Des Moines. Payment of this note was secured by the third of the papers mentioned, a chattel mortgage on a list of house-mission in excess of the legal rate of interest, also charging for certain extensions, that the loan was usurious, the lender not denying in fact that he knew such charge had been made; the court seeming to think the whole matter was a family arrangement to cover usury under the guise of commissions.

A loan was held usurious in which the lender's agent, in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, exacted of the borrower a bonus or commission for his own benefit, by virtue of an agreement between himself and the lender that he would look to the borrower for his compensation. Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611, 39 Am. Rep. 69; Thompson v. Ingram, 51 Ark. 546, 11 S. W. 881; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 384, 35 L. ed. 786, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, followed with approval in 141 U. S. 408, 35 L. ed. 793, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7; Ammondson v. Ryan, 111 Ill. 506; Texas Loan Agency v. Hunter, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 35 S. W. 399.

In Payne v. Henderson, 106 Ky. 135, 50 S. W. 34, it was held that a commission charged the borrower by the lender's agent might be recovered back as usury; the court saying that the lender must have known that her agent was being paid by the borrower, inasmuch as she herself did not pay him.

In Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 51 L.R.A. 499, 36 S. E. 837, an agent of the lender loaned money to the borrower, charging a commission in addition to the legal rate of interest. The court held the loan usurious if it was established that the lender intended to give his agent no compensation for making the loan, and the circumstances were such as to charge the lender with actual or constructive notice that his agent charged such commissions.

In the following cases it has been held, that a loan was rendered usurious, where the lender's general agent, vested with full power to loan and collect his principal's money, exercising his own discretion therein, exacted from the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest, it being presumed that the lender authorized such charge. In most of these cases an understanding existed between the lender and his agent that the agent might make all he could out of the loans. This presumption, however, is generally treated as one of fact, and may be rebutted. Avery v. Creigh, 35 Minn. 456, 29 N. W. 154; Lewis v. Willoughby, 43 Minn. 307, 45 N. W. 439 (in which the bonus was included in the securities, and, the mortgagor having given no evidence as to his knowledge or consent to such charge, the court said, as a matter of law, the lender would be charged with his agent's acts); Adamson v. Wiggins, 45 Minn. 448, 48 N. W. 185 (in which the court said: "The bonus was included in the note, and presumptively the agent was authorized by the plaintiff to so include it"); Hall v. Maudlin, 58 Minn. 137, 49 Am. St. Rep. 492, 59 N. W. 985; Horkan v. Nesbitt, 58 Minn. 487, 60 N. W. 132; Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 24 Am. St. Rep. 234, 49 N. W. 55; Hawkins v. Sauby, 48 Minn. 69, 60 N. W. 1015.

In Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130, it was held, where a general agent of the lender, in consideration of procuring the loan, charged the borrower a price in excess of their true value, for a span of horses, the loan was usurious, although the lender had no knowledge of such charge; her knowledge being presumed from the fact that the loan was made by her general agent, who was also her son.

In Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81, a general agent of the lender lent money to a borrower, charging a commission or bonus in excess of the legal rate of interest, it appearing that the lender had no knowledge of such charge; but, upon the death of the agent, the additional sum was paid each subsequent year to the agent's representative, and the court held the loan usurious from the date of the agent's death, inasmuch as there was no evidence that the lender did not then know of the charge; but before this time the knowledge could only be presumed from the general agency, which in this case was rebutted.

In McNeely v. Ford, 103 Iowa, 508, 64 Am. St. Rep. 195, 72 N. W. 672, a husband acting as his wife's agent loaned money, charging the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest; and the court held the loan usurious inasmuch as the wife left hold furniture, silverware, and glassware. The testimony of the appellees, corroborated by that of Judge Miller, is to the effect that during these negotiations appellant made no claim to be acting as agent for another or otherwise than in his own right. According to the statements of these witnesses, appellant said to them that he could not lend the money at 8 per cent, but must have $12.50 per month instead, payable monthly, but mentioned nothing about commission. These terms having been agreed to, the papers were made out, and appellant paid over to Mrs. Munro, or to Judge Miller for her, the sum of $350. Miller did not read the papers, and Mrs. Munro, who conducted the business for appellees, signed them, as she says, without reading them, and without hearing them read, assuming them to be all right, as she was assured by the appellant; and it was not until a considerably later date that appellees or Judge Miller became aware that appellant, claimed to have been acting as an agent only, and that the written evidences of the transaction had been made to indicate a third person as the real party in interest. It is true appellant testified that he informed the appellees that he was acting as agent for J. K. Little, and that the excess which he charged over the lawful rate of interest was his commission for procuring the loan; but in this a decided preponderance of the testimony is against him. Though the note is made payable in one month, it is very clear from the evidence that there was no expectation on all the business to her husband, authorizing him to make whatever terms he could; and, having ratified his acts by suing upon the note in which were included the commissions, she was then charged with his acts.

In Western Storage & Warehouse Co. v. Glasner, 169 Mo. 38, 68 S. W. 917, it was held, where the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission for procuring the loan in excess of the legal rate of interest, that the transaction was usurious whether the lender knew of the charge or not, the agent having been given full authority, at his discretion, to make loans. But the doctrine of this case was questioned in the concurring opinion in Little v. Hooker Steam Pump Co. 122 Mo. App. 620, 100 S. W. 561, where the general agent of the lender lent money charging the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest, the loan being held usurious, although the lender had no knowledge that such commission had been charged; a statute providing that a party exacting usurious interest cannot recover more than the principal and interest at the legal rate, after deducting all payments of usurious interest, whether paid as commissions or as interest.

In Stein v. Swensen, 44 Minn. 218, 46 N. W. 360, a general agent exacted a commission of the borrower for making the loan, in excess of the legal rate of interest, and a like commission for making extensions which latter commissions the evidence showed were unreasonable; and, in sending the case back for a new trial, the court said: "But, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the acts of a general agent in making such loans may be presumed, as a matter of fact, to have been authorized by the principal."

In Stephens v. Olson, 62 Minn. 295, 64 N. W. 898, a note, made by the cashier of the lender's private bank was held usurious because the cashier charged the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest and included the same in the note, although the lender had instructed his cashier, who was also his general agent, to make no charge in excess of the legal rate of interest, and had no knowledge that such charge had been made until the note fell due; it also appearing that the agent did not assume to charge the commission for himself, but for his principal.

In Robinson v. Blaker, 85 Minn. 242, 89 Am. St. Rep. 541, 88 N. W. 845, money was loaned by an agent, who charged a commission in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, the lender not having authorized such charge, and knowing nothing about it. The agent was not a general agent; but the court held such transaction usurious, inasmuch as the lender knew the amount to be loaned, and who the borrower would be, and gave his agent authority to make the loan, he thereby being charged with his agent's acts; the court saying that there was no magic charm about the term "general agent."

By the great weight of authority, the burden of proof is upon the borrower to show that the lender knew, or was chargeable with knowledge, that his agent exacted a commission from the borrower in excess of the legal rate of interest. Friedman v. Bruner, 25 Misc. 474, 54 N. Y. Supp. 997; Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473, 17 N. E. 379; Ammerman v. Ross, 84 Iowa, 359, 51 N. W. 6; Jordan v. Humphrey, 31 Minn. 495, 18 N. W. 450; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Olmsted v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 11 Neb. 487, 9 N. W. 650.

It has been held, where the lender's agent had general authority to make loans at his own discretion, that the burden of proof was upon the lender to overcome the presumption that he knew of, or consented to, his agent's charging the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest. Lewis v. Willoughby, supra; Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 24 Am. St. Rep. 234, 49 N. W. 55 (in which, in effect, the above rule was followed, though the court did not expressly say that the burden of proof was upon the lender); Hawkins v. Sauby, supra.

In the following cases it has been held, where a lender places funds in his agent's hands to loan, that the principal is bound by his agent's acts; and, if the agent charges the borrower a commission or bonus in excess of the legal rate of interest for procuring the loan, the transaction will be usurious, although he appropriates the same to part of either that it would be paid when due. At the end of the month, and at the end of each succeeding month thereafter down to and including September, 1906 (with one or two slight variations in the regularity of dates and amounts), Mrs. Munro paid or sent to the plaintiff the sum of $12.50, and at the time of each payment, or very soon thereafter, appellant prepared and obtained her signature to a paper in one of the following forms; the date of the period of extension being varied according to the date of the payment made, but on no occasion was the extension for more than one month:

G. H. France, Loan Broker,
Des Moines, Iowa.

This is to certify that I owe on my note of $363.50, made and executed by me August 11, 1904, in favor of J. K. Little, which note matured September 11, 1904, $363.50; that I have paid to apply on the principal no dollars; that what payments I have made to G. H. France from time to time, including payment made this day, have been made to him as commission or pay for his services as my authorized agent to procure loan and extension of time on same to February 11, 1905, for examining the records and securities at such time as he might deem proper, and such additional work as he has been required to do in procuring said loan and extension of time for me to said date, and interest due to said payee at 8 per cent per annum; that I have no claim or defense against said note, and will pay the same in full when due; that no part of the money paid is to apply on the debt due payee, except as described above.

Mrs. W. D. Munro.

G. H. France, Loan Broker,
Des Moines, Iowa.

I desire an extension of time on my note of $363.50, made and executed by me August 11, 1904, in favor of J. K. Little, which note matured September 11, 1904. I authorize G. H. France, as agent for me, to negotiate for said extension of time to October 11, 1904, for which I agree to pay $12.50 as commission and interest. The annual rate of interest that my note bears for the payee for the above-described time is to be first taken from the $— above described, and the remaining amount to go to G. H. France, my authorized agent, as commission or pay for his services for attending to said loan for me for said time, for re-examining the records and the securities at such times as he may deem proper, and such additional work as he is required to do in procuring said exhis own use, whether with or without his principal's knowledge and consent. In many of these cases the borrower signed application blanks prepared by the lender, in which the borrower made the lender's agent his own agent for procuring the loan; but the courts held that such papers did not constitute the agent an agent of the borrower, where evidence showed that such arrangement was a mere cover for usury. Cheney v. White, 5 Neb. 261, 25 Am. Rep. 487; Cheney v. Woodruff, 6 Neb. 151; Cheney v. Ebehardt, 8 Neb. 423, 1 N. W. 197; Olmsted v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. supra; Courtney v. Price, 12 Neb. 188, 10 N. W. 698; New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Hendrickson, 13 Neb. 157, 12 N. W. 916; Joslin v. Miller, 14 Neb. 91, 15 N. W. 214; Anderson v. Vallery, 39 Neb. 626, 58 N. W. 191; Hare v. Hooper, 56 Neb. 480, 76 N. W. 1055.

In Hare v. Winterer, 64 Neb. 551, 90 N. W. 544, the lender, residing in New York, loaned money through his agent in Nebraska, who charged the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest; and the court sustained a finding of usury on the ground that, where one through whose agent a loan is negotiated renders valuable services to the lender, and there is no reason to suppose that such services are gratuitous, the court or jury will ordinarily be justified in presuming that the lender knew the borrower had been required to pay for such services.

Most of the cases thus far cited have turned upon the question as to the effect of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the lender's knowledge or ignorance of the charges exacted by his agent from the borrower; and there is comparatively little direct authority upon the question as to what charges the lender's agent may make, with his knowledge and authority, without rendering the transaction usurious.

It has been held, however, that the lender's agent may, with his principal's knowledge and consent, receive from the borrower a reasonable compensation for examining securities, making abstracts of title when the loan is secured by mortgage, etc., without rendering the transaction usurious. Ammondson v. Ryan, 111 Ill. 506 (expressly holding that a reasonable charge may not render the loan usurious, though made with the lender's knowledge); Sanders v. Nicolson, 101 Ga. 739, 28 S. E. 976; McCall v. Herrin, 118 Ga. 522, 45 S. E. 442; Thomas v. Miller, 39 Minn. 339, 40 N. W. 358; Landis v. Saxton, 89 Mo. 380, 1 S. W. 359; New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Gay, 33 Fed. 636.

In Acheson v. Chase, 28 Minn. 211, 9 N. W. 734, a lender authorized his agent to loan money, charging the borrower a reasonable compensation for making the loan; and it was held, where such agent charged the borrower an unreasonable sum, that the loan was not thereby rendered usurious, for it was proper for the agent to charge the borrower a reasonable sum for services rendered, and in charging an unreasonable sum, of which the lender had no knowledge, the tension of time for me. I still owe to the payee on said note $363.50. I have no claim or defense against said note, and will pay the same in full when due.

Florence A. Munro.

The payments thus made amounted to $303.50, or, if we included the sum deducted in advance, they aggregated $317. Appellant's explanation of these transactions and of his own manner of doing business is substantially as follows: He says that the payee named in the note was his niece, who resided in Wisconsin, and whose money he had been handling and investing in Iowa since the year 1893. Miss Little has since died, and appellant is the duly appointed administrator of her estate in Wisconsin. During all of the period named he held Miss Little's power of attorney to make loans and to make and enforce collections due her in this state. Indeed, the money in appellant's hands, or a large part thereof, appears to have originally belonged to his father (Miss Little's grandfather) for whom he was handling and loaning it out in this state. On the death of his father the money descended to his sister, and upon her death to Miss Little. During this long period, and through all of these changes in ownership, the fund remained in the possession and immediate control of the appellant, and he made loans therefrom according to his own judgment. He alone passed upon the sufficiency of the security taken, and, so far as appears, none of the loans taken by him were ever submitted to her for approval. When the balance of cash on hand belonging to his niece was insufficient to make the desired loan, he sometimes supplemented it with his own money. At other times he admits having loaned his own money and taken the securities in Miss Little's name, and that $3,000 or $4,000 of such loans were outstanding, or at least uncanceled of record, at the time of her death. As administrator he had listed the note in suit as belonging to the estate; but there were other outstanding mortgages taken by him in her name which he did not so list. It is a significant fact that appellant professed to be unable to produce any of the correspondence between himself and his niece or any books showing his account with her prior to the year 1904, the year in which this loan was made. The account shown of dealings since that date and appellant's statement as a witness indicates that he kept a book account with her in which she was credited with moneys received and collections made, and charged with loans made from her funds and with moneys sent by him to her. The collections made were kept and cared for by him, except small sums remitted occasionally, as she might agent was not acting as the agent of the lender, but for himself.

In Mackey v. Winkler, 35 Minn. 513, 29 N. W. 337, a loan broker had made a loan to defendant of plaintiff's money, which he was authorized to loan, charging, in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, a commission for making the loan; and the court held that the loan was not usurious, the lender neither having knowledge of, nor in any manner consenting to, such commission, which was a reasonable one for the services performed.

In Avery v. Creigh, 35 Minn. 456, 29 N. W. 154, Borcherling v. Trefz, 40 N. J. Eq. 502, 2 Atl. 369, and Pfenning v. Scholer, 43 N. J. Eq. 15, 10 Atl. 833, the transactions were held usurious; but the doctrine was apparently recognized that the lender's agent might charge the borrower a reasonable sum for services without rendering the transaction usurious, although the lender was aware of such charge.

In Stein v. Swensen, supra, the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission for procuring the loan in excess of the legal rate of interest, and, in reversing the judgment of the lower court for error in excluding certain evidence, the court said that because the agent charged the borrower an unreasonable compensation for services does not, of itself, render the transaction usurious; but the unreasonableness is of greater or less weight to show that such amount was taken, in part, at least, as compensation for the use of the money.

In Courtney v. Price, supra, the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission of 5 per cent for procuring the loan, in excess of the legal rate of interest, and retained another 5 per cent for drafting papers, etc.; and the court held the loan usurious as to the 5 per cent commission, although the lender had no knowledge of such charge; but did not say whether the 5 per cent charge for drafting papers was usurious or not.

In Williams v. Bryan, 68 Tex. 593, 5 S. W. 401, the lender's agent charged the borrower a commission for procuring the loan in excess of the legal rate of interest; and the court held that the loan was not usurious, as the principal never knew of such charge; and further said: "Whether, in a transaction of this character, a payment by the borrower to the agent of the lender of a fair compensation for his services in effecting the loan, though with the knowledge and consent of the latter, should in any case be held to make the contract usurious, may be doubted."

In Ridgeway v. Davenport, 37 Wash. 134, 79 Pac. 606, it was held that, where an agent of the lender charged the borrower a commission in excess of the legal rate of interest, the loan was usurious, although the lender never authorized such charge, nor had knowledge of it; a statute forbidding interest in excess of 12 per cent, either directly or indirectly, and providing that the principal shall be held for the acts of any person contracting therefor.

need. So far as shown, she had no more actual knowledge of the individual loans, and exercised no more judgment or choice in relation thereto, than a perfect stranger to the transactions. It was wholly left to the appellant to exercise his own judgment and discretion and to protect her interests as he might deem wise or best, and, so far as the record shows, she did not undertake to pay him any compensation for his services, unless we may infer from the situation that he was to receive his profit in what he could obtain from borrowers in excess of the lawful interest charged. In short, if we give full credit to everything he says, he occupied the relation of attorney and personal representative of his niece, and his acts with reference thereto were her acts. If there be any alternative conclusion from the conceded facts, it is that as to the money placed in his hands by her the uncle and niece stood in the relation of debtor and creditor. Accepting either conclusion, the result is the same. If the latter were their true relation, the appellant, in making the loan, though taking the securities in her name, was acting in his own right, and his exaction of the equivalent of more than 40 per cent interest was usury. If, as claimed, he occupied a more intimate and fiduciary relation of attorney and personal representative, and made the loan for and in her behalf, prescribing its terms, passing upon the security offered, and doing all things with reference thereto which she might have done if personally present, he was her alter ego in the transaction, and his exaction of the exorbitant rate was her exaction. Either result reveals the taint of usury. It is no answer to say that this conclusion involves a disregard of the rule against parol testimony to vary the terms of a written contract. The game of hide and seek between the usurer and the law is not the product of recent evolution, and the rule has long been settled that, as in case of fraud in general, the rule referred to will not be allowed to exclude proof of the true nature of a contract into which the usurer is alleged to have entered. Seekel v. Norman, 71 Iowa, 264, 32 N. W. 334; Train v. Collins, 2 Pick. 145; Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. 418, 9 L. ed. 178. Says the Minnesota court: "All that is required to establish a case of usury is a fair preponderance of the evidence, and there is no device or shift on the part of the lender to evade the statute under or behind which the law will not look for the purpose of ascertaining the real character of the transaction." Phelps v. Montgomery, 60 Minn. 303, 62 N. W. 260.

As is well known, perhaps the most frequent device employed to effect usury is through the use of the name of some personal or family friend for whom the lender acts as ostensible agent; and all of the excess which can be exacted from the distress or recklessness of the borrower is sought to be accounted for as "commission." The ease with which this fraud is practised requires that courts scrutinize with care business dealings presenting such phases to see that the law is not evaded. It should not, however, be permitted to place the brand of illegality upon the conduct of one who acts in good faith as the agent of the borrower in securing for him a loan of money for which he charges and receives a reasonable compensation. Such transactions, when exhibiting no evidence of being a mere scheme to conceal usury, have often been upheld in our decisions. Gokey v. Knapp, 44 Iowa, 32; Greenfield v. Monaghan, 85 Iowa, 211, 52 N. W. 193; Richards v. Purdy, 90 Iowa, 502, 48 Am. St. Rep. 458, 58 N. W. 886, and other cases cited in the decisions here referred to. But the case at bar differs very radically from these and other precedents cited in behalf of the appellant. It comes much more nearly within the rule applied by this court in McNeely v. Ford, 103 Iowa, 508, 64 Am. St. Rep. 195, 72 N. W. 672. There the borrower, desiring a loan, applied to one McNeely, who furnished him $600, and took from him his promissory note payable to McNeely's wife for $642, bearing the highest legal rate of interest from date. The excess was embodied in the note, and the borrower testified that it was for additional interest; but McNeely claimed that it was simply his commission as agent for procuring the loan. When the note became due the time of payment was extended, and an additional payment was exacted in excess of the legal rate. It was shown upon the trial that the husband did have money belonging to the wife, which she trusted him to manage and lend in her name at his discretion, and that he invested it as best he could, and did not consult her as to the terms of loans so made. Upon this showing, we said there was "no doubt that in this transaction McNeely acted solely as agent for his wife, and was not entitled to any commission from the defendant for effecting the loan, and that the several amounts added to the notes over and above the amount received by the defendant were usurious." Directly in point is the case of Hall v. Maudlin, 58 Minn. 137, 49 Am. St. Rep. 492, 59 N. W. 985. There, as here, a nonresident left money in the hands of one Evarts, a resident agent, to whom he gave full power to invest it according to his best judgment. Stating the case, the court says: "He took no part in the business himself, but left everything to the sole discretion of Evarts, who never consulted him, but loaned money when, to whom, and upon such terms as he saw fit, and, when it was repaid, loaned it again as he pleased. Everts's general mode of doing business was to charge the borrowers, in addition to the interest provided for in the note, a bonus or commission. . . . There is no evidence that plaintiff gave Everts any express authority to charge more than the legal rate of interest, and no direct evidence that he knew that he was doing so; but it does appear that he paid Everts nothing for his services, and that the understanding between them was that he 'would get his commissions out of the charges, that whatever he realized from the business would be from commissions that people would pay him for getting the money for them.' . . . When the loan was made to the defendants, Everts, in accordance with his usual custom, retained out of the amount loaned $25, giving the defendants only $225. It is idle to claim from the evidence that Everts was in this transaction a loan broker, or in any sense the agent of defendants. He was acting solely as the agent of plaintiff, and performed no services beyond what any lender would do in his own behalf. . . . If the business had been conducted by plaintiff personally, no one would question the usurious character of the transaction. No one would claim that, where a man is lending his own money, he can charge to the borrower, in addition to the maximum legal rate of interest, all the expenses of transacting his own business, including compensation for his own services in attending to it. But, if he can cast all this burden upon the borrowers by merely turning over the business to a general agent, there would be very little left of the statute against usury. . . . Where the lender thus places his business under the exclusive and unlimited control of a general agent, if the agent exacts usury, the case stands precisely as if it had been done by the principal personally, and such an agent has no right to exact from the borrower, either for alleged services or otherwise, anything which the principal might not have lawfully exacted had he transacted the business in person." In all essential particulars the facts here stated parallel the facts in the case at bar, and we are content to follow the rule there announced as eminently righteous and just. To the same general effect, see Dayton v. Dearholt, 85 Wis. 151, 55 N. W. 147; Horkan v. Nesbitt, 58 Minn. 487, 60 N. W. 132; Kemmitt v. Adamson, 44 Minn. 121, 46 N. W. 327; Banks v. Flint, 54 Ark. 40, 10 L.R.A. 459, 14 S. W. 769, 16 S. W. 477; Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co. 141 U. S. 384, 35 L. ed. 786, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Olmsted v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 11 Neb. 487, 9 S. W. 650; Pfenning v. Scholer, 43 N. J. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Eq. 15, 10 Atl. 833; Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611, 39 Am. Rep. 69; Cheney v. White, 5 Neb. 261, 25 Am. Rep. 487; Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 24 Am. St. Rep. 234, 49 N. W. 55; Note to Bank of Newport v. Cook, 46 Am. St. Rep. 198; Dade v. Spalding, 52 Minn. 356, 54 N. W. 591.

It is not necessary to go to the extent of some of these decisions to support our conclusions in the present case; but we cite them to show the general tendency of the courts to penetrate the masks under which evasions of usury laws habitually hide, and to say that contracts so tainted shall be enforced no further than the statute permits. In Dade v. Spalding, supra, the circumstances of the loan by an alleged agent with the exaction of a bonus or commission at the outset, and for each monthly extension, and the careful procurement of a written statement from the borrower with each monthly renewal, were after the manner or plan pursued by the appellant herein. Upon this showing, Mr. Justice Mitchell very aptly observed: "The formalities and contrivances resorted to to clothe the transaction on Hoffman's part with the appearance of that of an agent were so unusual and yet so transparent as to fully warrant the jury in concluding that he, and not Webster, who never once appeared either in the transaction or on the trial, was the real principal. If transparent contrivances of this sort to evade the statute should prove effectual, the administration of the law would fall into deserved disrepute. We never met with a case where the maxim 'that unusual clauses always excite suspicion' was more applicable." It would be hard to imagine a case to which that animadversion could be more fitly directed than the one here presented. The workmanship of the plan employed is entirely too elaborate and artistic to be the natural accompaniment of an ordinary business transaction, in which there is nothing to conceal.

That the trial court reached the correct conclusion is not open to any reasonable doubt.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

FERDINAND FRANZEN et al., Appts.,
v.

MARTHA M. HAMMOND, Respt.

(— Wis. —, 116 N. W. 169.)

Usury — knowledge of lender.

1. There is no conclusive presumption that a mother knew that her son, in investing her money for her without compensation, was securing compensation for his services from the borrower.

Same—agent's bonus.

2. A loan is not rendered usurious by the fact that the agent of the lender, without his knowledge or consent, exacts from the borrower a bonus for his service in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, which the contract reserves for the benefit of the lender.

Same — enforcement of contract — knowledge.

3. The attempt by a principal to enforce a loan contract made by an agent on his behalf which covers the exact amount of money loaned and shows on its face that the loan was legitimate does not render the contract usurious, although he has obtained knowledge that the agent retained from the loan, solely for his own benefit, a sum which, added to the rate of interest reserved, would be usurious.

(May 8, 1906.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in defendant's favor in an action brought to cancel a mortgage alleged to be invalid for usury. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to set aside and cancel a mortgage on the ground that the same was tainted with usury and before the commencement of the action plaintiffs duly tendered to the defendant the entire sum to which she was entitled. The issues were decided thus: April 14, 1905, plaintiffs gave defendant their note secured by mortgage for $790, due one year from date with 8 per cent interest per annum. April 30, 1906, plaintiffs duly tendered in payment of said note $750, and demanded a satisfaction of the mortgage. The loan was made through a son of defendant, who had authority to make loans for her and draw checks therefor on her bank account. He received no compensation from her for his services and was responsible for all loans he made. He took from plaintiffs the note and mortgage in question for the defendant, giving two checks on her account signed by him as agent, one for $750, and one for $40, the last of which was duly indorsed and given back to the agent. She had no further knowledge of the transaction than that her son accounted to her for $790, drawn from her bank account, by delivering the note and mortgage. She did not make or authorize an usurious contract.

Note. — As to whether commissions charged by lender's agent will characterize the loan as usurious, see case note to France v. Munro, ante, 391. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Upon such facts, the conclusion was reached that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. Judgment was entered accordingly in defendant's favor.

Mr. Max H. Strehlow, with Mr. O. G. Erickson, for appellants.

Mr. Orlando E. Clark, for respondent:

To constitute usury there must be an intention on the part of the lender to contract for or take usurious interest, or authority to an agent to take, or knowledge that the agent is taking, such for the benefit of the lender.

Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 98, 29 L. ed. 559, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301; Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, 78 Am. Dec. 144; Bank of Newport v. Cook, 46 Am. St. Rep. 197, note; Fay v. Lovejoy, 20 Wis. 407; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 463; Greenfield v. Monaghan, 85 Iowa, 211, 52 N. W. 193; Acheson v. Chase, 28 Minn. 211, 9 N. W. 734.

The rule is not affected by the fact that the relation between principal and agent is that of parent and child.

29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 503; Brigham v. Myers, 51 Iowa, 397, 33 Am. Rep. 140, 1 N. W. 613.

The authority to loan money does not, by implication, include authority to loan it at an illegal rate.

Gokey v. Knapp, 44 Iowa, 32.

The burden of proof is on the one alleging usury.

Abbott v. Stone, 172 Ill. 634, 64 Am. St. Rep. 60, 50 N. E. 328.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are unable to discover any warrant for disturbing the findings of fact. The only question raised in regard thereto is whether respondent knew her son exacted from the borrower a sum of money in addition to lawful interest for the loan, and retained the same as compensation for his services. The direct evidence is to the effect that she had no such knowledge; but the claim is made that, from the circumstance of the agent not receiving compensation from the lender, a presumption arises that she knew he received such from the borrower; and many authorities are cited to that effect. None of them hold that such circumstance is more than evidentiary. Where it is of such probative character as to create a presumption of knowledge, it is subject to be rebutted as it was sufficiently in this case to warrant the finding. Because of the relationship existing between respondent and her agent, he being her son, it was most natural that she did not expect to pay him any pecuniary consideration for his services, nor suspect that he would receive any secret benefit from handling her money; that she trusted him to conduct her business in consideration of their relationship.

Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81, is a good illustration of many cases that might be cited supporting the suggestion that the presumption referred to, when it arises, is merely one of fact which yields readily to evidence showing the contrary. The court said: "It may be presumed, where the agency is general, and embraces the business of making, managing, and collecting the loans of a moneyed man," and he makes an usurious loan, that it was authorized by the lender. "But it is a presumption of fact, and may be rebutted."

The presumption did arise in that case; but it was held rebutted by circumstances authorizing a finding that the action of the agent was unauthorized, and that the exaction of the excessive amount for the use of the money was for his benefit only, and must have been so understood by the borrower.

It is useless to review the many cases cited where it has been held that in case of the exaction of a bonus by the agent of the lender, which, with the interest charged, exceeded the lawful rate of interest, the transaction was usurious. None of them involved exactly such circumstances as characterized this case. In substance, all of the excessive exactions, though ostensibly as commissions, were in fact cloaks for the real purpose of obtaining more than legal interest for the money.

The proposition submitted here is this: If a person intrusts another with money to loan, and such other loans the same, charging and receiving from the borrower a sum of money in addition to legal interest as compensation for his services, but without any direction by, or knowledge of, the lender, is the contract between the lender and borrower tainted with usury?

The cases cited to our attention to support the affirmative do not seem to be in point. In Kemmitt v. Adamson, 44 Minn. 121, 46 N. W. 327, the lender actually participated in the transaction. In Avery v. Creigh, 35 Minn. 456, 29 N. W. 154, the agent was expressly authorized to make all he could for himself out of the borrower, and, pursuant thereto, he charged and received a sum in excess of a reasonable commission. In Joslin v. Miller, 14 Neb. 91, 15 N. W. 214, the agent and the lender shared in the exaction which in the whole, added to the interest agreed upon in the note, was excessive. In Stephens v. Olson, 62 Minn. 295, 64 N. W. 898, the principal had the benefit, though without his knowledge, of the excessive charge. It was included in the note, and the lender, after learning of the fact, ratified the agent's act by insisting upon payment of the note as written. In Meers v. Stevens, 106 Ill. 549, it was found as a fact that the transactions of the agent were resorted to for the very purpose of circumventing the usury law.

All the other cases referred to by appellants' counsel outside of this state are similar to those we have mentioned, except Austin v. Harrington, 28 Vt. 130, and one or two others of that class, holding that, where one makes another a general agent for the loaning of money, he is bound by all such other does within the apparent scope of the agency, though he has no knowledge thereof; and that such apparent scope includes the charging of a commission so large as to render the contract usurious. There are two lines of cases on the subject, one holding that the making of usurious loans is not within the apparent scope of a general agency to loan money; and it seems that such is the better rule. The following belong to such class: Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, 78 Am. Dec. 137; Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446; Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Gokey v. Knapp, 44 Iowa, 33; Muir v. Newark Sav. Inst. 16 N. J. Eq. 537; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Manning v. Young, 28 N. J. Eq. 568; Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473, 17 N. E. 379; Baldwin v. Doying, 114 N. Y. 452, 21 N. E. 1007.

The rule laid down in Condit v. Baldwin, supra, is followed in all of the cases cited, and, with few exceptions, has been adopted by the courts of this country. It is stated thus: If "an agent intrusted with money to invest at legal interest" exacts "a bonus for himself as the condition of making a loan, without the knowledge or authority of his principal," such circumstance does "not constitute usury in the principal, nor affect the security in his hands." The court said, in effect, that it is only where the agent or the lender takes a sum in excess of legal interest under such circumstances that the sum so taken can be considered as obtained in whole or in part for the lender that the contract is tainted with usury, and, even in that case, it is not so tainted unless the lender knows of the taking and ratifies it; that, when the sum taken is for the agent exclusively and so understood by the borrower, there is no taint of usury; that acceptance of the note by the lender and assertion of a right to recover thereon according to its terms, only ratifies the contract as expressed in the paper.

The doctrine above stated seems to be sound. It is not within the apparent scope of a legitimate business agency to violate the law. So, where an agent loans money, exacting a bonus for himself, the presumption is rather that it is without the knowledge of the principal than with such knowledge. It logically follows that the circumstance of a principal accepting securities from his agent covering the exact amount of money loaned and showing on their face that the loan was legitimate, and insisting upon enforcing the same after obtaining knowledge of the excess the agent charged solely for his own benefit, does not make the transaction, as to the lender, usurious. A very large array of authority to that effect is found cited to the text of Webb on Usury, at § 93, and Tyler on Usury, at page 170.

The latter author, after reviewing the authorities, and particularly Austin v. Harrington, supra,—one of the few cases out of harmony with the foregoing,—said: "The doctrine is well settled, and universally recognized, that an agent may lawfully take a reasonable commission or bonus from the borrower for his expenses and services in effecting a loan; and, whenever the lender is not privy to the arrangement between the borrower and agent, or in no way participates in the commission or bonus, the transaction will be regarded as free from the taint of usury. . . . If an agent, in making a loan of money, accepts from the borrower a bonus beyond the legal rate of interest, such act of the agent will not render the contract usurious, if the bonus was taken without the knowledge of the principal, and was not received by him."

That is stated as the law declared in New Jersey, New York, and elsewhere.

The same subject was treated in Acheson v. Chase, 28 Minn. 211, 9 N. W. 734, the court holding, under circumstances similar to those here, that the contract was not tainted with usury, and that in such a case the exaction of the bonus and receipt of the same was not within the apparent scope of the agency contract and so not ratified by the lender's insisting upon the validity of the securities according to their tenor after obtaining knowledge of the fact.

But counsel for appellants contend that this court is committed to the very limited line of authorities not in harmony with what has been said, of which Austin v. Harrington, supra, is a good sample. Such is not the opinion of the court.

In McFarland v. Carr, 16 Wis. 259, the agent made the loan under directions of the lender, and received the bonus, not as his own, but as the money of his principal. The court distinctly held that in such circumstances as we have here the contract would not be tainted with usury. The case 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was distinguished from those we have cited, particularly Condit v. Baldwin, supra. The ground of the decision is stated in these words: "We must assume that Warden, in making the loan and exacting the payment of the $50, acted as agent of McFarland" (the lender). If that were so no one will contend that the contract was not usurious. In this case it must be kept in mind, though respondent's son acted as her agent, he did not as such agent exact the bonus. He exacted it independently of his agency. He demanded it, not for his principal, but for himself, as the court found.

In Ottillie v. Wächter, 33 Wis. 252, the agent acted solely for the borrower, and it was held that in such a case the exaction by the agent from his principal with knowledge of the lender of a bonus does not constitute usury. McFarland v. Carr, supra, was referred to inadvertently, in a way to indicate that its scope is other than that which we have stated as to the circumstance being that the exaction was with the knowledge and by the direction of the principal. Condit v. Baldwin, supra, was referred to and the rule thereof stated without approval or disapproval.

It is the opinion of the court that Condit v. Baldwin, so far as it holds that the exaction by the agent of a lender, without his knowledge or participation, of the borrower, of a sum as commission for doing the business, such exaction being a private matter between the agent and the borrower, does not make the loan contract as to the lender usurious; that it is not within the apparent scope of such an agency to violate the law, and that the receipt by the lender of the security, regular upon its face, and assertion of a right to enforce it according to its tenor, does not constitute ratification of any act of the agent in violation of law, is sound. The result is that the judgment must be affirmed.

So ordered.

v.

FIRST STATE BANK OF SCOTT CITY,
Plff. in Err.

(— Kan. —, 96 Pac. 490.)

Banks — forged check — findings — material issues.

1. In an action by a depositor against a bank to recover the amount of a check which it was alleged was forged, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and a special finding that they were unable to agree whether the signature to the check was written by the plaintiff. Held, that it was error to refuse to set aside the verdict and to render judgment thereon.

Same — check — payment — negligence.

2. It is not negligence for a bank to pay a check written on the blank of another bank without making inquiry.

Same — writing.

3. Neither any rule of law, nor the ordinary course of business, renders it a matter of suspicion that the body of a check is not written in the handwriting of the maker.

Same — negligence.

4. None of the facts found by the jury were sufficient to constitute negligence on the part of the bank.

ERROR from the District Court for Scott County to review a judgment for plain-

Case Note. — Paying check written on the blank of another bank as negligence.

The only case found aside from VOGELI v. FIRST STATE BANK which considers directly the question of the liability of a bank for paying a check written on the blank of another bank, with the name of the latter erased, is Morris v. Beaumont Nat. Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 97, 83 S. W. 36. Here a depositor in the First National Bank of Beaumont gave two checks on that bank for a subscription to corporation stock. For some reason they were at once countermanded and the bank notified not to pay them. The holder of the checks was also notified, but they were never surrendered. At the suggestion of the bank, and in order to guard against their payment through inadvertence, the entire deposit was withdrawn and placed with the Beaumont National Bank. The checks were written upon the printed blanks of the first-named bank, and in that manner they were presented for payment to that bank, which, however, was refused. Thereupon the holder ran a pencil through the printed word "First" and substituted in pencil "Bmt." and, upon their presentation to the last-named bank, they were paid in full and charged against the deposit. On discovery of the facts, the drawer demanded the full balance of the deposit without reference to the checks, which were denounced as forgeries. The bank defended on the ground that they were innocent holders of the checks without notice of the forgery, and that it was the local custom for banks to pay checks where the printed name of the payor was erased and another inserted in writing, and that in fact they had paid other checks of the drawer written the same way, which were genuine. The court, however, took occasion in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a check. Reversed.

Statement by Porter, J.:

The plaintiff, B. Vogel, brought this action against the bank to recover the proceeds of a check for $1,800, the signature to which he claims was forged. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: On May 4, 1904, plaintiff had on deposit in defendant bank the sum of about $4,000. At that time he informed the cashier of the bank that he was going to Illinois and Missouri on a visit, and requested drafts or a letter of credit so that he might get his checks cashed anywhere, and was given a letter of credit good for the amount of $400. The petition alleges that the check which the bank paid was not drawn on a form of its bank, but on a blank of the American National Bank of Kansas City, Missouri; that the plaintiff never signed the check, and that defendant carelessly, negligently, and without any authority from him cashed the check sion to say: "We understand the law to be in line with the contention of plaintiffs. As between the depositor and defendant, the latter is held to a knowledge of the signature and handwriting of its customer, and, in the absence of some fault on the part of the customer affecting the question of liability, a forged check, whether the forgery was accomplished by material alteration or the forgery of the signature, is honored by the depositee at its peril. There can be no question as to the materiality of the alteration. The plaintiffs are not shown to have been guilty of any negligence in respect to these checks, and it certainly cannot be contended with any show of reason that it was their duty to foresee Turner's fraudulent act and notify defendant as against checks which had not been drawn against it. No local custom can give vitality to a forged check." It appears in this case that the date of the checks had not been altered, and thus it clearly was shown that they were drawn prior to the time there was a deposit in the bank. However, if this was a factor in the decision of the case, it was not brought out, for the court, aside from mentioning that fact, takes no further notice of it.

Leavitt v. Stanton, Hill & D. Supp. 413, also involved the payment of a forged draft written on a blank of another bank. Here, however, the signature was forged, and the fact that it was written on the blank of another bank was considered an element in favor of the drawee bank, since it appeared that all of the drawer's business was done with the same kind of checks, and the negligence complained of was the fact that the check book was left in such a place that the forger was permitted to get hold of one. It was held, however, that this, with various other circumstances, was insufficient to excuse the drawee bank.

without making any inquiry of the plaintiff as to its genuineness, and, if the defendant bank had exercised due diligence, and had made inquiry, it could have ascertained before paying it that the same was forged and fraudulent. The petition alleges that the plaintiff returned to Scott City on the 15th day of September, 1904, had his bank book balanced and his checks returned, and immediately notified the bank that the check in controversy was fraudulent and forged, and demanded of the bank the repayment of the amount.

There was a conflict in the evidence as to the genuineness of the signature to the check, expert testimony being offered on both sides. The plaintiff was asked if the signature to the check was his, and answered as follows: "Don't look like my signature; I never signed my signature to no check." In his testimony he admitted that while in Sedalia, Missouri, he met a stranger who offered to send him some seed wheat if he would sign his name in a book; that he wrote his name in what appeared to be a blank book with a fountain pen which the stranger handed to him, and that he signed it while standing in the street; that he did not have his glasses on at the time though he generally used glasses when he wrote; that he had no place on which to rest his arm at the time of writing; that in the conversation he had informed the stranger that he lived in Scott City and had sold his farm. The officers of the bank and others testified that after he returned home he admitted in different conversations that his signature to the check was genuine, but that he had no intention of signing a check when he wrote his name. On September 19th he signed a statement for the bank to this effect. On October 28th he signed another statement as follows:

Scott City, Kansas, Oct. 28, 1904.

Relative to the check in favor of J. O. Montgomery on the First State Bank of Scott City, Kansas, given August 15, 1904, and indorsed by J. O. Montgomery and others is fraudulent except my signature, which is genuine, but the said signature was obtained by fraud by the said J. O. Montgomery or J. O. Logan as he represented himself to be at the time of obtaining the signature.

B. Vogeli.

The plaintiff denied that he knew the contents of these papers when he signed them, but this was contradicted by several witnesses. One of the officers of the bank went to Kansas City at different times for the purpose of attempting to recover the money. He was accompanied by the plaintiff on one of these trips, and the bank officers testified that the foregoing papers were signed by the plaintiff in order to be used in recovering the money. The plaintiff had been a depositor of the bank for a number of years. He was sixty-seven years of age, rather illiterate, and frequently had the cashier of the bank write his checks for him, which he would sign. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the check, upon which the court rendered judgment.

In addition to the general verdict, the jury returned the following findings:

(1) Was the signature to the check in controversy written by the plaintiff?

Answer: Can't agree.

(2) Was the defendant guilty of negligence in paying said check?

Answer: Yes.

(3) If you answer that the defendant was guilty of negligence, state what the negligence consists of?

Answer: In paying a check that was written on a blank of another bank without making inquiry, and for an amount in excess of letter of credit, and after having paid the check written by Vogeli on a bank check of defendant bank for $100 and seeing that the check sued on was not filled up by Vogeli.

(4) Was the plaintiff guilty of negligence in signing his name to some blank paper or partly filled-out paper in the hands of a stranger?

Answer: Yes.

The bank brings these proceedings in error.

Messrs. F. V. Martin and J. S. Simmons for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. B. Washington and Peters & Peters for defendant in error.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The instructions properly told the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove that the signature was not genuine, and that he must do so by a preponderance of the evidence. On this very material issue the jury were unable to agree, but, for some reason which is not apparent, the court refused to set aside the verdict, and rendered judgment. This was error. If the signature was genuine the bank was obliged to pay unless there was something in the appearance of the check to excite suspicion, or there was some fact known to the bank sufficient to put it upon inquiry. True, the jury found that the bank was guilty of negligence in paying the check, but they also found in what the negligence consisted, and no one of the things or all of them combined would constitute negligence. It is not negligence for a bank to pay a depositor's check written on the form of another bank. There is no invariable rule by which customers of a bank are required to use a blank check prepared by the bank, and in the ordinary course of business it is of very common occurrence to use a check of another bank, erase the name and insert that of the bank in which the depositor's account is kept. This occurs every day in all banks.

Nor did the fact that the check was for an amount in excess of the $400 letter of credit tend to prove negligence or put the bank upon inquiry. The letter was given the plaintiff to establish credit with other banks or persons with whom he might have business. His account was subject to check, and he needed no letter of credit to oblige the bank to pay checks drawn by himself. Again, the fact that, some days previously, the bank had paid a check for $100 drawn by the plaintiff on a regular blank of the defendant was wholly immaterial, and not sufficient to excite suspicion as to the genuineness of the check in controversy. The last circumstance found by the jury is that the check was not filled out by the plaintiff; but there was nothing unusual in this, even if the plaintiff had not been in the habit of having others fill out his checks. "The rule requiring the bank to know the customer's handwriting was always confined to requiring a knowledge of his signature. Neither any rule of law, nor the ordinary course of business, renders it a matter of suspicion that the body of the check or bill is not written in the handwriting of the maker or drawer." 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 480. The rule is stated in 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1654, as follows: "But a bank is not bound to know more than the signature of the drawer of the check; for in the ordinary course of business the body of the check is as often as otherwise filled up by a clerk, and it is by no means a matter of suspicion that it is not filled up in the handwriting of the drawer. If the rule were otherwise, a bank could never safely pay a check filled up in a handwriting not the drawer's until it had inquired of the drawer whether it was properly filled up. And to require this would greatly embarrass commercial transactions." To the same effect, see Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 400, 419, 13 Am. Rep. 190; Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 N. Y. 230, 234; National Park Bank v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 55 Barb. 87, 124.

If this check had been genuine, and the failure of the bank to pay it resulted in loss to the plaintiff, the bank would have been liable to him for all damages resulting therefrom, and none of the circumstances mentioned by the jury would have relieved the bank from its liability. Of course, a false or fraudulent alteration in any material matter in the body of the check after signature would have constituted technical forgery, and the bank would have been liable to the plaintiff, unless by some act of negligence upon his part he furnished the opportunity for the fraud which deceived the bank, in which case he must suffer the just consequences of his own carelessness, and bear the loss. The jury found that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in signing his name to some blank or partly filled out paper in the hands of a stranger; and it is insisted that, on the facts found, judgment should be directed for the defendant. There was no motion or request for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and it is unnecessary to consider the effect of this finding.

The motion to strike from the petition all allegations with reference to the payment of the $100 check and the giving of the letter of credit should have been sustained, since they were averments of immaterial facts which added nothing to the plaintiff's cause of action.

The failure of the jury to agree upon one of the most material issues in the case, as well as the inconsistent findings as to the negligence of the bank, require that the judgment be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF KINSLEY

v.

J. N. DYERLY, Appt.

(— Kan. —, 98 Pac. 228.)

Interstate commerce — sale by agent.

1. In a prosecution for the violation of a city ordinance imposing a license tax upon persons soliciting orders for the sale of goods, where it is shown that the defendant is the agent of a merchant of another state, and carries samples of goods, and solicits orders, which he sends to his principal for approval, the mere fact that

Note. — The question involved in the above case, whether the interstate character of a transaction is affected by the circumstance that goods ordered from a non-resident vendor are delivered through his agent, is discussed, with other related questions, in a case note to State v. Bayer, ante, 297, on, License or occupation tax on hawkers and peddlers, and persons engaged in soliciting orders, by sample or otherwise, as a violation of the commerce clause.

the principal, after accepting the order, ships the goods to the same agent, with authority to deliver them to the purchaser and collect the price, will not prevent the transaction from being "interstate commerce."

Same—sale and delivery by agent.

2. The right of a merchant of another state to sell his goods in this state carries with it the right to deliver them, and to employ for that purpose any agency he may deem proper, provided that at no time before the delivery the goods become so mingled with the common mass of property here as to deprive the transaction of its interstate features.

Same — license — ordinance — violation — burden of proof.

3. In a case like that referred to in the first paragraph, if there be a doubt as to whether the sale was completed by the acceptance of the orders by the principal and his shipping the goods, the contrary cannot be assumed in order to sustain a conviction. The prosecution must establish its case.

(November 7, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Edwards County convicting him of violating a city ordinance prohibiting the peddling of goods at retail without a license. Reversed.

Statement by Porter, J.:

J. N. Dyerly was charged with the violation of an ordinance of the city of Kinsley in peddling goods in the city at retail, and soliciting persons to buy goods, without first having obtained a license therefor. He was convicted in the police court, and appealed to the district court, where there was a trial without a jury. The district court adjudged him guilty, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and stand committed until the fine and costs were paid. From this conviction he appeals. His defense is that he was engaged in interstate commerce. The validity of the ordinance is not involved. The ordinance imposed a fee of $20 a day on "peddlers and soliciting agents selling goods at retail." The court made findings of fact as follows: "First, that the defendant, J. N. Dyerly, had no license to peddle goods or merchandise in the city of Kinsley; second, that the defendant was in the city of Kinsley at the time stated, and did make the sale to Mrs. Erwin as testified by her; third, that the defendant was at that time and on that date engaged in the business of soliciting orders for rugs for future delivery, which orders were to be sent by him to Kansas City, and to the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, and the goods shipped to him at Kinsley, and by 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

him delivered to the parties who had ordered same, who were to make payment to him for the same upon delivery." The court held as conclusions of law: "First, that the single sale to Mrs. Erwin would not be sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant of the charge of peddling within the limits of the city of Kinsley without a license; second, that the method of transacting the business by defendant, as described by him, left the sale incomplete until the goods had been received by him in Kinsley, and by him delivered, which method deprives the transaction of its interstate features, and renders it liable to the ordinance of the city."

The method by which the business of the defendant was conducted is described by him in his testimony as follows:

Q. What business are you engaged in?

A. Soliciting for the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, Kansas City, Missouri.

Q. What was the nature of your soliciting business, the work you did?

A. We took orders and sent them in to the company, and, when the company approved of it, they sent the goods, and we delivered them.

Q. You didn't carry any goods around with you for delivery?

A. No, sir.

Q. You carried samples?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You worked for a house in Missouri?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you sell and deliver any rugs in this city?

A. No, sir; I did not. . . .

Q. What were you doing,—merely taking orders?

A. Taking orders.

Q. What was done with those orders when you took them?

A. Sent them to Kansas City, and when the goods came, I came and delivered them.

[On cross-examination.]

Q. Were you peddling rugs in town here?

A. No, sir.

Q. Didn't have any rugs here at all?

A. I had rugs here for samples.

Q. Weren't you around trying to sell rugs?

A. No, sir.

Q. What were you doing with them?

A. Trying to take orders from them.

Q. What did you do with those orders?

A. Sent them to Kansas City.

Q. And those rugs would be shipped to you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You delivered them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And collected the money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was your business?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. For instance, if you had sold the rugs to Mrs. Erwin, you would take the order and send it to Kansas City for approval, and when they came, you would deliver them and collect the money?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. J. M. Harris for appellant.

Mr. F. Dumont Smith, for appellee:

The sale was completed in Kansas, and is not interstate commerce.

Re Pringle, 67 Kan. 364, 72 Pac. 864.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the authority of Kansas City v. Collins, 34 Kan. 434, 8 Pac. 865, the court properly held that the single sale made by the defendant failed to establish the fact that he was a peddler, but found the defendant guilty of selling goods at retail as a soliciting agent, contrary to the provisions of the ordinance. The court expressly held that the fact that the goods were shipped to the person who solicited the orders, and that he delivered them and collected the purchase price, necessarily deprived the transactions of their interstate character. To this we cannot agree. It is contended that the ruling in this respect follows what was decided in Kansas City v. Collins, supra. That case presented the following facts: A firm of wholesale dealers in Kansas City, Missouri, sent their traveling agent into this state, who visited various places of business in the city of Kansas with samples, and solicited orders from merchants. The orders were taken by him to the dealer in Kansas City, Missouri, and, when approved by the dealer, the latter packed the goods at his place of business, and sent them to the purchasers in Kansas, where they were delivered, and paid for. In the opinion Justice Valentine observes that the evidence shows that the goods were not delivered by the defendant, and that the payments for the goods were not made to him. But the opinion nowhere holds that, if such had been the case, it would have necessarily deprived the transaction of its interstate character. The syllabus reads as follows: "Where an agent, such as is usually denominated a 'drummer' or 'commercial traveler,' simply exhibits samples of goods kept for sale by his principal, and takes orders from purchasers for such goods, which goods are afterward to be delivered by the principal to the purchasers, and payment for the goods is to be made by the purchasers to the principal on such delivery, such agent is neither a peddler nor a merchant." See also State v. Hickox, 64 Kan. 650, 68 Pac. 35. To hold 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the principal may not make delivery and collect payment by an agent duly authorized for that purpose is to deny the law of agency. In the case of Re Spain (C. C.) 14 L.R.A. 97, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 738, 47 Fed. 208, the agent who sold the goods by sample afterwards delivered them, and made settlement by collection or by notes for the principal. In the opinion it is said: "The right to sell implies the obligation and right to deliver. It is as much interstate commerce to do one as the other." The right to sell includes the right to sell by an agent. Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 34 L. ed. 150, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 143, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725. And it must be true that the right to deliver includes the right to deliver by an agent. Delivery by an express company, where the goods are shipped C. O. D., has been held to be interstate commerce. O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693. So, when the goods are shipped into the state with a draft attached to the bill of lading, the transaction is interstate commerce. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 65, 66, and cases cited. In Huntington v. Mahan, 142 Ind. 695, 51 Am. St. Rep. 200, 42 N. E. 463, delivery was made by another agent, and an ordinance attempting to impose a license tax upon him was held invalid.

It is apparent that the case at bar was only partially tried. There is no finding, nor is there any evidence to support a finding, with respect to the method by which the shipments and delivery of the goods were made. When the orders were approved by the company at Kansas City, Missouri, were such orders filled by the appropriation of specific articles for that purpose, which were sent to the defendant as the agent of the company for delivery? Where a purchaser was dissatisfied with the quality of the goods, and refused to accept them, what became of them? Were they returned to the dealer, or were they left with and did they become the property of the defendant? Did the Missouri company require the defendant to pay for the goods before they were shipped or delivered to him? Were the circumstances under which the goods were shipped such that, when received by the defendant, they became mingled with the general mass of property in the state? The trial court held that the delivery of the goods by the agent constituted the sale, and that all these questions were answered by that fact. The only evidence as to the methods under which the business was transacted is that of the defendant. He testified that he made sales by sample only; that he was the agent of the L. B. Price Mercantile Company of Kansas City, Missouri; that he carried rugs and solicited orders by sample; that he sent the orders for approval to his principal; that the principal sent him the goods to be delivered and to make collection for payment,—all of which might be true and the transaction be interstate commerce. On the other hand, other facts might exist, not appearing in the evidence nor in the findings, which would deprive the transactions of their interstate character. Re Pringle, 67 Kan. 364, 72 Pac. 864; Croy v. Obion County, 104 Tenn. 525, 51 L.R.A. 254, 78 Am. St. Rep. 931, 58 S. W. 235; State v. Montgomery, 94 Me. 192, 80 Am. St. Rep. 386, 47 Atl. 165. In Gill v. Kaufman, 16 Kan. 571, and in McCarty v. Gordon, 16 Kan. 35, it was held that, where the drummer or agent merely solicits and transmits the order, the transaction or sale does not become complete until the order is accepted by the principal. The place of the contract is where the proposal is accepted. In State v. Willingham, 9 Wyo. 290, 52 L.R.A. 198, 87 Am. St. Rep. 948, 62 Pac. 797, the business was held to be interstate commerce, and the only difference in the facts is that the principal shipped the goods into the foreign state consigned to itself, but the agent who solicited the order delivered them and collected the price. It was said in the opinion: "The delivery of the articles to the persons ordering did not constitute a sale by the agent making the delivery; but the manufacture, shipment, and delivery of the goods were simply steps taken by the Chicago company in the performance of its contract. The shipment of them by the company to itself at Cheyenne had no greater significance than if they had been sent by the company from one of its warehouses to another in the city of Chicago. They were still the subject of interstate commerce, and the arrest of the agent was not authorized by law."

The Supreme Court of the United States in a recent case had its attention directed to practically the same question. Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 51 L. ed. 295, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159. The statement of facts from the opinion is as follows: "An Ohio corporation employed an agent to solicit in Sunbury retail orders to the company for groceries. When the company had received a large number of such orders, it filled them at its place of business in Columbus, Ohio, by putting up the objects of the several orders in distinct packages, and forwarding them to the defendant by rail, addressed to him 'For A. B.,' the customer, with the number of the order also on the package for further identification. The company ultimately kept the orders, but it kept no book accounts with the customers, looking only to the defendant. The defendant alone had authority to receive the goods from the railroad, and, when he received them, he delivered them, as was his duty, to the customers for cash paid to him. He then sent the money to the corporation. The customer had the right to refuse the goods if not equal to the sample shown to him when he gave the order. In that or other cases of nondelivery the defendant returned the goods to Columbus. No shipments were made to the defendant except to fill such orders, and no deliveries were made by him except to the parties named on the packages." It was contended in the argument that the order was not accepted, and did not bind the Ohio corporation until the delivery took place, which is practically the contention here. Commenting on this the court says in the opinion: "The fair meaning of the agreed fact that the orders were given to agents employed to solicit them is that the company offered the goods, and that the orders were acceptances of offers from the other side. If there were the slightest reason to doubt that the contracts were made with the company, through its authorized agent, at the moment when the orders were given, which we do not perceive that there is, certainly the contrary could not be assumed in order to sustain a conviction. It is for the prosecution to make out its case." It will be observed that some important facts in that case do not appear in this. There is no showing here how the goods were shipped to the defendant; that is, whether there was an appropriation by the dealer in Kansas City, Missouri, of specific goods to be delivered to certain purchasers. We cite the case, however, because it holds that the agent who solicits the order may be made the agent to deliver and collect, without destroying the interstate character of the transaction. It also recognizes the doctrine that the contract of sale was complete, in that case, at the moment when the orders were given (as in this case when the orders were accepted), and further holds that, if there be a doubt with respect to this, the contrary cannot be assumed in order to sustain a conviction.

It is also urged that the case of Re Pringle, supra, is to the contrary and decisive; but nothing there decided conflicts, in our opinion, with this. There the methods of the business carried on were shown in detail. True, the person who took the orders delivered the goods and collected the money; but these were by no means the controlling facts upon which the case turned. There the goods were shipped in bulk, in one box, by express, C. O. D., to the person who claimed to be the agent. When the goods arrived, he paid the charges, and distributed the contents to his various customers. Moreover, the orders which he sent to his alleged principal did not "disclose the names of any of the purchasers of any of the goods, or the kind or quantity desired by any one of them." And, "when shipped, none of the goods was marked or otherwise designated for any particular individual." When he received the goods, he treated them as his own, and allowed customers to select indiscriminately from the goods such as they desired to purchase. Under these facts, the inevitable conclusion was reached by the court that the goods lost their distinctive character, "and were blended with the common property of the state as soon as he received his box," and that "the foreign merchant had no trade relations whatever with the ultimate purchasers." In distinguishing the case from State v. Hickox, 64 Kan. 650, 68 Pac. 35, Mr. Justice Burch said: "In that case the salesman actually represented a merchant of another state. The purchaser's order was sent to that merchant. That merchant reserved the right to accept or reject the orders sent in, and did pass on them. The identical order given by the purchaser was filled. When the goods were shipped, they were shipped to the actual purchaser. At no time did the agent deliver any of the goods. In this case the petitioner merely took orders for himself for goods which he intended to purchase, and which he did afterwards purchase, and which he paid for and received in this state. The orders of the final recipients of the goods were never transmitted beyond the state, or accepted or filled by anyone beyond the state, and the goods were not delivered to the carrier for transportation to them." It is true that in the Hickox Case the goods were shipped to the actual purchaser, and the agent delivered none of them; but it is apparent that the case turned upon other facts than these. The salesman actually represented a merchant of another state, and solicited orders which he sent to his principal for approval. The principal had the right to accept or reject the orders, and actually passed upon them. The identical order given by the purchaser was filled. There is no intimation in the opinion that it might not have been filled by sending the goods to the same salesman as agent for the purpose of delivery. In McLaughlin v. South Bend, 126 Ind. 471, 10 L.R.A. 357, 26 N. E. 185, a similar ordinance was held invalid, as applied to an agent who solicited orders in Indiana for books to be delivered at a future time. The books were in the city of Chicago. He procured orders, which he transmitted to the publishers in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Chicago, where the order was filled by sending the books ordered to him, and he delivered them to the purchaser. It has often been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States that an ordinance imposing a license fee upon agents representing citizens of another state, who offer goods in this state for sale by sample, is void, because it assumes to establish a regulation affecting commerce between the states. McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 392, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 181, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881; Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 32 L. ed. 637, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 256; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Robbins v. Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

The conviction in this case is predicated squarely upon the fact that the goods were shipped to the defendant, that he made the delivery and collected the price. We cannot affirm the judgment without declaring the law to be that these facts deprive the transaction of its interstate features. No case decided by this court, and none that we have been able to find, goes to that extent.

For these reasons the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial

Deposition — before trial — right.

1. A defendant has the right to take plaintiff's deposition before trial, under a statute providing that a party may be examined at the instance of the adverse party Case Note. — What evidence admissible to show mental anguish.

This note is confined to cases in which a recovery was sought for mental anguish alone, and does not include cases in which mental suffering was one of the elements of the damages suffered by the plaintiff.

In the great majority of the cases evidence as to mental anguish has been held admissible; in a number of the cases it is held that mental anguish is a matter of inference, and not of proof, and in a few cases such evidence is held inadmissible. But the general rule is to the effect that evidence as to the mental anguish is admissible.

Thus, in the following cases, in actions for negligence in the transmission and delivery of telegrams, the evidence indicated was held admissible:

by deposition, as any other witness, where the circumstances are such as to entitle him to take the deposition of a witness other than a party to the suit.

Continuance — refusal — statutory right — error.

2. Refusal to continue a case to permit defendant to take the deposition of plaintiff to enable him to prepare his defense, to which he has a right by statute, is prejudicial error.

Damages — delay in telegram — aggravating circumstances.

3. Upon the question of the damages to be allowed a son for mental anguish in being deprived of the privilege of attending his mother's deathbed, because of neglect to deliver a telegram, evidence is not admissible that he is a physician, and that treatments given by him when she had previously had similar attacks had resulted in recovery, or that she was depressed by his failure to come when expected, which had a tendency to hasten her death.

promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. Fearons, J. W. Brown, and J. W. Alcorn, with Messrs. Richards & Ronald, for appellant:

Defendant was entitled to take plaintiff's deposition.

Re Abeles, 12 Kan. 451.

Messrs. Bethurum & Bethurum for appellee.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

On February 1, 1906, about 9 o'clock in the evening, W. J. Sparks sent the following message from Mt. Vernon to appellant, J. M. Williams, 654 Fourth street, Louisville, Kentucky:

Lovell says you had better come. Mamma no better.

[Signed]

W. J. Sparks.

This telegram reached the Western Union office in Louisville at 10:56 P. M. It was not delivered until shortly after 8 o'clock the next morning,—too late for appellee to take the morning train for his mother's 364, 18 S. W. 701 (evidence that the plaintiff was his mother's favorite son).

So, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419, it was held that the natural utterances and expressions indicative of pleasure, displeasure, pain, or suffering are competent original evidence that may be received in proof of the physical or mental state they indicate, whenever that state is a pertinent inquiry.

And in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Trice (Tex. Civ. App.) 48 S. W. 770, evidence was admitted to the effect that the plaintiff had a very strong affection for her brother.

So, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Heathcoat, 149 Ala. 623, 43 S. W. 117, it was held that it was competent for the plaintiff to testify that she suffered mental pain and anguish.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Terrell, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 30 S. W. 70, evidence that plaintiff had abandoned his family was held admissible to show absence of mental anguish, in an action for negligence in transmission and delivery of a telegram.

Evidence that a dying person called for plaintiff and wanted to know of the attendants why he did not come was held, in Potter v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 116 N. W. 130, competent to show mental anguish; and an allegation of similar purport in a complaint was held proper in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Evans, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 297, 21 S. W. 266, although no evidence in support of the allegation was offered. But similar evidence was held inadmissible in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waller, 96 Tex. 589, 94 Am. St. Rep. 936, 74 S. W. 751; and to the same home. Had he taken this train, he would have reached Mt. Vernon at 1:24 P. M. His mother died at 3:20 P. M. Appellee instituted this action to recover damages for his mental anguish resulting from the failure of appellant to deliver the telegram to him in time to enable him to reach his mother's bedside before her death. Appellant answered, denying negligence on its part, and pleading contributory negligence on the part of appellee. According to the testimony for appellant, its night-delivery clerk made an effort to call appellee over both telephones immediately upon receiving the telegram. Being unable to reach him, a messenger boy proceeded to 654 Fourth street. After considerable search, he found appellee's office. There was no one there, and he left a note stating that the Western Union had a telegram for Dr. J. M. Williams. According to the testimony for appellee, he had a telephone connection in his sleeping apartments, which were immediately over his office, which rang whenever his office was called. He was in his apartments at the time it is alleged the boy attempted to deliver the message, and also at the time appellant claims to have called him over the phone, and he heard no call of any kind. When he received the message the next morning a little after 8 o'clock, it was then too late for him to take the 8:10 train for the home of his mother. The jury awarded appellee damages in the sum of $750. A new trial was refused, and the telegraph company prosecutes this appeal.

The case was assigned to the 27th day of September, 1907, for trial. On the 24th day of September the defendant tendered a motion for an order to require the plaintiff to give his deposition, as provided by subsection 8 of § 606 of the Code of Practice, and to continue the case until such time as appellant could take the deposition of plaintiff, and summon or take the deposition of witnesses to rebut such portions of his testimony as it should desire. In support of said motion, appellant filed the following affidavit, which was sworn to by its attorney, A. G. Ronald: "Affiant, A. G. Ronald, says that he is one of the attorneys for the defendant herein; that, on the 19th day of September, 1907, plaintiff, Dr. J. M. Williams, and his attorney, Mr. Herman Nettleroth, were present at the office of the clerk of the district court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky for the purpose of taking the deposition of certain witnesses on behalf of the defendant herein; that, while plaintiff and his coun-effect was the decision in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jackson, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 419, 80 S. W. 649.

The rule in North Carolina is that a recovery may be had for mental anguish alone; and, while it is presumed in cases in which close relationship exists, nevertheless it is a matter of direct proof, and may be shown by plaintiff's own testimony or by other evidence.

Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 456, 12 S. E. 427; Cashion v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493; Bright v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841; Hunter v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 N. C. 465, 47 S. E. 745; Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 147, 55 S. E. 435, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 476; Shepard v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 244, 118 Am. St. Rep. 796, 55 S. E. 704; Whitten v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 141 N. C. 361, 54 S. E. 289; Alexander v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 141 N. C. 75, 53 S. E. 657.

In some cases it has been held that positive testimony as to mental anguish is not necessary, but may be inferred. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 75 Tex. 531, 6 L.R.A. 844, 16 Am. St. Rep. 920, 12 S. W. 867; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McLeod (Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 988; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Porter (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 866; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Blair (Tex. Civ. App.) 113 S. W. 164.

So, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMorris, (Ala.) 48 So. 349, it was held that, when wounded feelings or mental pain forms an element of recoverable damages, direct proof of such suffering is not necessary, but it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may be inferred by the jury from the circumstances attending the particular breach of the contract or duty.

As was suggested above, a few cases are to the contrary.

Thus, in City Nat. Bank v. Jeffries, 73 Ala. 183, it was held that mental anguish was a matter of inference, and not of direct proof; and consequently the plaintiff should not have been allowed to testify as to his condition of mind, etc.

So, in Willis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 69 S. C. 531, 104 Am. St. Rep. 828, 48 S. E. 538, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 52, it was held that a statement by the plaintiff as to what his peculiar apprehensions and conclusions were on failure to receive a telegram in reply to one sent by him inquiring as to the condition of his sick mother was inadmissible.

Testimony that a deceased son seemed nearer and dearer to plaintiff than any of her other children was held, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Linton (Tex. Civ. App.) 109 S. W. 942, to be incompetent where there was no allegation of special affection.

Evidence of feelings which could be only the result of morbid sensitiveness was held inadmissible in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stiles, 89 Tex. 312, 34 S. W. 438.

Evidence as to the number of children and grandchildren of the sendee of a telegram and their location is irrelevant in an action by the father for damages for neglect to deliver to his mother-in-law a telegram announcing the serious illness of one of the grandchildren. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crocker, 135 Ala. 492, 69 L.R.A. 398, 33 So. 45.

sel were thus present, the defendant, as its attorney, called the plaintiff as a witness for the purpose of examining said plaintiff, as provided under subsection 8 of § 606 of the Kentucky Code of Practice; that the plaintiff declined and refused to testify or to answer any questions that might have been put to him by this affiant as attorney aforesaid, and, on advice of his counsel, left the room. Affiant says that he thereafter, on said day, caused a subpoena to be issued by an officer duly authorized to issue same, summoning plaintiff to appear as a witness to testify in this cause, as provided in subsection 8 of § 606 of the Kentucky Code of Practice at the office of Clarence E. Walker, Louisville Trust Building, Louisville, Kentucky, on the 21st day of September, 1907 at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and that said subpoena was duly served upon said plaintiff and also a notice that his deposition would be taken as aforesaid; that the plaintiff and his counsel did appear at the office of said Clarence E. Walker, notary public, at the time and place named in said subpoena, but that this plaintiff declined and refused to give his deposition, and, upon the advice of his counsel, declined and refused to answer any questions which might have been put to him by affiant as attorney aforesaid. Affiant says that this action has been instituted in a court which sits more than 100 miles distant from the place where the occurrences which are made the basis of the suit transpired; that the only way to rebut any claim or statement that may be made by the plaintiff is to bring its witnesses to the place where the court is held or to take their depositions; that neither the defendant, nor affiant, nor any of its counsel, have any knowledge or information as to what statement or claims will be made by the plaintiff, and do not know the witnesses whose depositions it will be necessary to take or to have present as witnesses. Affiant says that defendant cannot properly prepare this case for trial, or cannot properly prepare its defense, without taking the deposition of plaintiff, as provided for in the section of the Code of Practice above referred to; that, under said section, it has the right to take the deposition of plaintiff in order that it may know what evidence it has to rebut, and what witnesses to call; that, after plaintiff gives his testimony on the witness stand at the trial of this cause, there will not be sufficient time for it to secure the attendance of the witnesses who would rebut same, or take their depositions. Affiant says that this motion is not made for the purpose of delay, but only that it may be placed in a position where it can properly prepare its defense; that, unless it is given an opportunity to examine plaintiff, and he is required to submit to said examination, this defendant will be deprived of a substantial right; that it cannot safely go to trial without the exercise of the right of examination of plaintiff, granted to it by the Code of Practice, and without the opportunity of procuring witnesses to rebut the testimony if it should so desire. Affiant says that, had said plaintiff submitted to an examination, or given his testimony upon either of the occasions upon which he was called as a witness by the defendant, it would have had sufficient time to rebut his testimony if it so desired, and would have been ready to go to trial."

The court refused to allow either the motion or the affidavit to be filed, but passed the matter to the day upon which the case was set for trial. On said day the court allowed the motion and affidavit to be filed, but overruled the motion, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The case then proceeded to trial. At the conclusion of the testimony of appellee in chief as a witness in his own behalf, appellant avowed that it was taken by surprise by the testimony of appellee to the effect that the telephone in his office was at all times connected by wire with the telephone in his sleeping apartments, and that, when the telephone in his office was rung, the telephone in his sleeping apartments was also rung for the same call; also, by the statement that the rule of the railroad company was that it would not postpone the departure of its trains except to await the coming in of a connecting train. Appellant further avowed that it could introduce testimony to rebut the statements made by appellee, but was then unable to do so because the witnesses it required for that purpose lived so far away that their presence could not be obtained or their depositions taken. Appellant thereupon moved the court to set aside the swearing of the jury, and continue the case or postpone the trial until such reasonable time as would give appellant an opportunity to take the depositions of said witnesses, all of whom it alleged resided in the city of Louisville. This motion the court overruled, and appellant excepted.

In support of its contention that the trial court erred in failing to grant it a continuance when it was made known to the court that appellee had declined to give his deposition, appellant relies upon subsection 8 of § 606 of the Civil Code of Practice. This section is as follows: "A party may be examined as if under cross-examination at the instance of the adverse party, either orally or by deposition as any other witness; but the party calling such examination shall not be concluded thereby, but may rebut it by counter testimony." It is insisted by counsel for appellee that the only purpose of this provision is to enable one party to get the benefit of the testimony of the adverse party at the trial; that, therefore, if the adverse party whose deposition the other party sought to take actually appears at the trial and testifies, and subjects himself to cross-examination, the party seeking his deposition cannot complain because he failed to take it. While this view appears plausible, the Code itself does not place any such restriction upon the right of one taking the deposition of the adverse party. It gives to one party the absolute right to take the deposition of the adverse party as that of any other witness. It appears that appellee, whose deposition it was sought to take, lived more than 20 miles from the county seat where the trial was to take place, and, in addition to this, he was a practising physician. If, then, he were a witness other than the plaintiff in the case, appellant would have had the right to take his deposition. That being the case, it necessarily follows that, under subsection 8 of § 606, appellant had the right to take his deposition. It is earnestly insisted that the right given by subsection 8 of § 606, if interpreted according to the contention of appellant, is liable to great abuse; that it will enable the party to find out his opponent's evidence in advance of the trial. As, however, the right is given to each party, they will both be upon terms of equality; and, as it is to be presumed that neither will offer any evidence other than the exact facts and truth of the case, we do not see how either could be prejudiced. By § 537 of the Code, the right is given to a defendant to begin taking depositions immediately after filing his answer. Appellant's answer had been filed when it made the motion for a continuance on the ground that appellee had declined to give his deposition. Appellant had the right to take appellee's deposition. This right was denied to it. We therefore think the court should, under the circumstances, have continued the case, and its failure so to do was prejudicial error.

Appellant also insists that the trial court erred in permitting appellee to testify to the fact that he, in conjunction with Dr. Lovell, a physician who attended his mother at the time of her death, had treated his mother frequently before, and that she yielded to such treatment and speedily recovered; also, that the court erred in permitting Dr. Lovell to testify to the fact that appellee's mother was disappointed and depressed when she heard that her son had not arrived on the train, and that this disappointment and consequent depression had a tendency to hasten her death. Counsel for appellee insist that such evidence was admissible as bearing upon appellee's mental anguish, for his grief would be all the greater because of his inability to give his mother the treatment that had previously brought about her recovery, and because of the fact that she was depressed by reason of his failure to arrive in time to see her. In our opinion, however, the effect of appellee's testimony would be to lead the jury to the conclusion that the telegraph company was in a sense responsible for the death of appellee's mother because of his failure to get there and give her the treatment that had formerly resulted in her recovery, while to admit the testimony of Dr. Lovell would, in effect, permit a recovery for the mother's anguish, instead of the son's. This is one of the few courts giving the right of recovery in cases of mental anguish. We have restricted this to cases of the nearest degree of relationship. The ground of this restriction is that there is a natural mental anguish resulting from a failure to arrive at the bedside of a dying relative or the failure to attend the funeral of such relative. The law naturally concludes that mental anguish in case of such relationship will necessarily follow. If testimony of the kind given above were admissible, there would be no reason for restricting a recovery to cases of the nearest degree of relationship, for friends could frequently prove greater mental anguish than could a parent or son. Again, if such testimony were admissible, a son might prove that the relationship between him and his mother was more tender than that which usually exists between mother and son. He might go into matters of sentiment and love which it would be impossible for the defendant in any way to rebut. We think that in cases of this kind the party suing should be confined to a statement of the mere facts of mental anguish, and should not be permitted to introduce testimony of the nature referred to for the mere purpose of harrowing the feelings of the jury, and increasing the size of the verdict. Upon the next trial the court will exclude such testimony.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
Appt.,
v.
C. C. ROE.

(— Ky. —, 112 S. W. 683.)

Attorney — disbarment — right of state.

A proceeding to disbar an attorney for unfitness to practise his profession because he has collected money for clients which he has refused upon demand to pay over may be instituted by the commonwealth's attorney in the name of the commonwealth, although a statute permits him to be disbarred for the cause specified upon application of the person whose money is withheld.

(October 8, 1908.)

APPEAL by the State from an order of the First Division, of the Common Pleas, Circuit Court for Jefferson County dismissing an information filed to secure the disbarment of defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Breathitt, Attorney General, W. O. Harris, and A. Scott Bullitt, with Mr. Alexander P. Humphrey, Jr., for appellant:

The information was properly brought in the name of the commonwealth.

Wilson v. Popham, 91 Ky. 327, 15 S. W. 859; Com. v. Richie, 114 Ky. 366, 70 S. W. 1054; Richardson v. People's Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 919, 92 S. W. 284; Nelson v. Com. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 143, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272, 109 S. W. 337.

The information alleges facts sufficient to show that defendant should no longer be allowed to practise as an attorney.

Baker v. Com. 10 Bush, 592; Tudor v. Com. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 87, 84 S. W. 522.

Messrs. T. B. McGregor and J. M. Huffaker also for appellant.

Case Note. — Disbarment or suspension of attorney for withholding client's money or property.

Since honesty, probity, and good moral character are necessary qualifications of an attorney for the practice of his profession, it has been almost universally held that an attorney who, upon demand, retains money collected for his client, or fraudulently appropriates to his own use money which has come into his hands in a professional way, is not of such honesty and good character as to make him worthy of the confidence of the public and his clients; and therefore the courts have not hesitated in disbaring or striking from the rolls one guilty of such acts. Among the cases supporting the above proposition, are the following: Re Treadwell, 67 Cal. 353, 7 Pac. 724 (money collected by attorney on note, and not paid over); Re Tyler, 71 Cal. 353, 12 Pac. 289, 13 Pac. 169, reaffirmed in 78 Cal. 307, 12 Am. St. Rep. 55, 20 Pac. 674 (suspension for two years for retaining money collected on note and insurance policy, besides other unprofessional conduct); Re Moore, 72 Cal. 359, 13 Pac. 885 (suspension of five years for converting to his own use moneys received by him to be applied to particular purposes); Re Burris, 101 Cal. 624, 36 Pac. 101 (retaining money procured from administratrix under false representations that it was necessary for deposit with probate court); People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Walkey, 26 Colo. 483, 58 Pac. 501 (aside from other unprofessional conduct, collection and appropriation to his own use of money belonging to client, and refusing to turn over the same to its owner upon proper demand); People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Betts, 26 Colo. 521, 58 Pac. 1091 (retaining money by attorney, advanced for payment of costs in suit which in fact had been dismissed); People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this proceeding was to disbar the appellee, a practising attorney at law in the city of Louisville. The information filed against him by the commonwealth's attorney of the district, in the name of the commonwealth, was as follows: "Commonwealth of Kentucky v. C. C. Roe, Joseph M. In Delano's Case, 58 N. H. 5, 42 Am. Rep. 555, an attorney at law was disbarred for appropriating to his own use money coming into his hands as collector of taxes, the court saying that his situation as collector of taxes was, in substance, the situation of an attorney recovering money for a client.

In Re Hill, 9 Best & S. 481, an attorney acting as a clerk to a firm of attorneys was suspended for twelve months because of the appropriation by him of money to his own use, which he had received in completing the sale of certain property. The court, in this case, although recognizing that the misconduct was not committed strictly in his professional character, yet said that it was such misconduct as would have prevented him from being admitted as an attorney, quently demanded, he failed and refused to pay to Gray the amount to which he was entitled.] Wherefore, the said commonwealth's attorney charges that, by the commission of the acts aforesaid, the said C. C. Roe has shown himself to be a person devoid of honesty, probity, and good demeanor, and is totally unfit to be an attorney at law and a member of the bar of said court." In another paragraph, containing the same technical averments, it is charged that, as the attorney for one Mary Glover, he collected $250, and failed to pay any part thereof until long after the same was due, although payment was frequently demanded. Upon the filing of this information, accompanied by affidavits made by the persons for whom the money was collected, a rule was issued against Roe to show cause why his authority as an attorney to practise and be an officer of the court should not be revoked.

Upon hearing the proceeding, the court dismissed it upon the face of the papers, upon the ground that it should have been instituted and prosecuted in the name of the persons for whom it was charged Roe had collected the money, and not in the name of the commonwealth. In reaching this conclusion the lower court followed the opinion of this court in Wilson v. Popham, 91 Ky. 327, 15 S. W. 859. In that case there was a motion in the name of Popham against H. T. Wilson, an attorney to show cause, if any he had, why he should not pay over to him by certain day money and they would deal with him as if he were now applying for admission.

In Re Temple, 33 Minn. 343, 23 N. W. 463, an attorney was suspended for six months for making arrangements with the maker of a note for boarding his partner as payment of the note, and then, without accounting to his client, who repudiated the arrangement, permitting the boarding-house keeper to stand the loss.

In Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 13 L.R.A. 767, 22 Atl. 441, it was held that the absolute disbarment of an attorney is justified where, upon receiving an unenforceable claim against his own client, he caused a complaint to be served in the name of another attorney, and then advised his client to settle, falsely telling him, with full knowledge of the facts, that the claim was good and could be collected out of his property.

In Jeffries v. Laurie, 27 Fed. 195, an attorney who disobeyed an order by the court to pay over money collected by him for his client was disbarred and committed to jail for ninety days for contempt.

In Re Snyder, 24 Fed. 910, a weak-minded person laboring under the hallucination that he had committed a crime fled to another state. There he was discovered by certain detectives and officers, who, with the hope of obtaining a reward, had him arrested, and committed him to jail. The officers took a lawyer into their confidence, and, on learning of his innocence, they together proceeded to ship him out of the country and to divide all the money sent to him by his relatives. In a proceeding to disbar the attorney, it was held that the conduct on the part of his attorney was sufficient to justify the court in striking his name from the roll of attorneys and disbarring him from practice.

In People ex rel. Deneen v. Gilmore, 214 Ill. 569, 69 L.R.A. 701, 73 N. E. 737, it was held that a license to practise law will be revoked which is secured by a fraudulent concealment of the fact that the plaintiff has recently been convicted of embezzling funds from a client in another state,—especially if, since its issuance, the plaintiff has been guilty of professional misconduct evincing such lack of personal integrity and professional honor as to establish that he is unworthy to be allowed to hold it.

In Re Bleakley, 5 Paige, 311, it was held that, where a solicitor collects money for his client which he refuses to pay over, the petitioner, if necessary, may apply for a precept of commitment, or apply to remove him from his office of solicitor.

In Re Knowles, 16 Ont. Pr. Rep. 408, it was ordered that a solicitor should be struck off the roll unless by a named day he paid all money found to belong to his client, together with the costs of the motion to strike him off the roll.

In Re J. B., An Attorney, 6 Manitoba L. Rep. 19, for the retaining of money which belonged to his client, an attorney was taken off the attorneys' roll, but not off the barristers'.

In Re Hoffecker (Del. Ch.) 60 Atl. 981, an attorney was stricken off the roll of solicitors on chancery, which, however, had no effect on his practice before the law courts, for disposing of a trust fund invested in safe securities, and reinvesting it in industrial corporations of which he himself was the promoter, resulting in the loss and dissipation of the fund.

Insufficient defenses.

Many and various have been the excuses and defenses offered by the attorneys against whom disbarment proceedings have been instituted for fraudulent appropriation of their clients' money. Among these defenses is payment after the commencement of the proceedings. This, however, it has been universally held is not in itself sufficient to permit the dismissal of the proceedings.

Thus, in People ex rel. Carr v. Selig, 25 Colo. 505, 55 Pac. 722, it was held that an attorney at law who refuses to pay over money collected for a client cannot relieve himself from the consequences of the violation of professional duty by paying over the money after the commencement of disbarment proceedings, though in a proper case it may be considered in mitigation of the punishment.

Other cases holding to the same effect he had collected as his attorney. The proceeding was instituted under § 104 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, reading as follows: "If any attorney at law shall collect the money of his client, and, on demand, wrongfully neglect or refuse to pay over the same, the circuit court of the county in which the money may be collected shall, after notifying the attorney to show cause against the same, suspend him from practice in any court for twelve months, and until the money shall be paid. Before any such motion shall be entertained, a demand of the money shall be made of such attorney in the county of his residence, and no such proceeding shall take place unless it is commenced within two years next after the collection of the money." Wilson moved the court to quash the rule because the proceeding against him should have been in the name of the commonwealth in place of Popham. In answer to this objection, the court said: "This proceeding is, however, under a statute which relates to but one act of an attorney. It embraces a single act of misconduct, and that is one where there is always a person immediately and directly interested. It is true the public are incidentally interested, and, therefore, the legislature, upon the idea, likely, that otherwise it may not be properly prosecuted, has provided that the attorney for the commonwealth shall attend to the proceeding. The statute does not say in whose name it shall be carried on, and, in view of the fact that there is always a person di-are People ex rel. Whittemore v. Ryalls, 8 Colo. 332, 7 Pac. 290, and People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Keegan, 30 Colo. 71, 69 Pac. 524; also Re Davies, 93 Pa. 116, 39 Am. Rep. 729, where a settlement was effected between the client and the attorney as to the payment of a bond which the latter had collected, the client consenting to the entering of a nolle prosequi.

In People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Waldron, 28 Colo. 249, 64 Pac. 186, it was held that, in a disbarment proceeding against an attorney for appropriating to his own use money received by him to be loaned for the benefit of his client, neither his youth and inexperience, nor the fact that since the wrong was done he had repaid the larger part of the deficit, was sufficient as a defense.

In McMath v. Maus' Bros. Boot & Shoe Store, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 952, 15 S. W. 879, it was held no defense to a disbarment proceeding against an attorney for retaining money collected for his client, that he is holding such money to indemnify him for the indebtedness of the collecting agency through which he received the claim for collection.

In People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Webster, 31 Colo. 43, 71 Pac. 1116, it was held that the fact that the money was retained by reason of negligence and carelessness as a result of the disease of alcoholism was no defense to a disbarment proceeding.

In People ex rel. Carr v. Selig, supra, it was held no defense to a disbarment proceeding against an attorney for refusing to pay over money collected for his client, that the money was collected for the guardian of minor children, and that he loaned the money to prevent his client's husband from using it for his own personal benefit.

Sufficient defenses.

It has, however, often been the case that, although the conduct of the attorney in dealing with his client in regard to the latter's money was not a commendable one, yet it probably was not of such a nature as to call for such drastic measures as a disbarment proceeding.

Thus, in Re Veeder, 11 N. M. 43, 66 Pac. 545, it was held that neglect on the part of the attorney to notify a client of the collection of money, or neglect immediately to pay over money collected, may, in certain circumstances, be reprehensible; but it is not, alone, sufficient ground for disbarment, if there is an absence of fraud, trickery, or deceit.

In Guilford v. Sims, 13 C. B. 370, it was held that the mere nonpayment of money by an attorney pursuant to an order and rule of court is not sufficient ground for striking him off the roll. To the same effect is Re Campbell, 32 U. C. Q. B. 444.

In Re Duncan, 64 S. C. 461, 42 S. E. 433, it was held that, although the conduct of an attorney in depositing his client's money in his own name and checking it out for his own use, claiming to be able to replace it at any time, is reprehensible, it does not furnish ground for disbarment.

In Com. v. McKay, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 407, 20 S. W. 276, it was held a good defense to a disbarment proceeding that the client was indebted to the attorney in a sum exceeding the amount collected.

It was held in Re Thresher, 29 Mont. 11, 73 Pac. 1109, that, although an attorney for an administratrix has no right to retain from funds collected for her an amount claimed by him as due from her decedent, yet the retention of funds for such purposes does not merit so severe a penalty as that of disbarment.

In Re Ross, 16 Ont. Pr. Rep. 482, it was held that, where there is some dispute as to whether or not there is a balance due the client, an order should not be granted striking the attorney from the rolls for nonpayment. To the same effect is People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Robinson, 32 Colo. 241, 75 Pac. 922.

In Re Lentz, 65 N. J. L. 134, 50 L.R.A. 415, 46 Atl. 761, it was held that the fact that an attorney wrongfully appropriated money belonging to his client without any actual intention to defraud and with the expectation of paying it over as soon as required, coupled with the fact that since then he had conducted himself with integrity in rectly interested in the proceeding, it seems to us it should be prosecuted in his or her name. Under the statute, this person must take the preliminary steps necessary to its institution. He only can demand payment of the money, and, as he is immediately interested, and knows whether there is ground for the proceeding, he should, in case it be unfounded, be responsible for the costs to the attorney. He is therefore the proper party to the proceeding, because, if he can, without proper ground, act in the name of the commonwealth, then there can be no judgment for costs to the attorney, and he is remediless, although another was immediately interested and directly instrumental in putting the proceeding upon foot. The motion to quash the proceeding was therefore properly overruled." The radical difference between the procedure in the Wilson Case and in this one is that there the proceeding was instituted by the individual wronged, and it was sought to punish Wilson under and by virtue of the statute, while here the proceeding is not by the injured client or under the statute, but is in the name of the commonwealth for an offense that shows the attorney unfit to practise his profession. It is true the offense committed by Wilson and Roe was the same, but it does not follow from this that there is only one method by which the offender may be punished, and that the one adopted in the Wilson Case. The statute in question only describes one offense for which an attorney may be suspended from practising law. It does not point out the other causes for which he may be disbarred.

As further illustrating the fact that the statute in respect to the causes for which an attorney may be disbarred or the method of procedure is not exclusive, we may call attention to § 97 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, providing that "no person convicted of treason or felony shall be permitted to practise in any court as counsel or attorney at law." But this does not mean that only those who have been convicted of felony or treason may be disbarred. It would be doing a serious injustice to the intelligence of the lawmaking department of the state to hold that such was their intention, or to conclude that, by the enactment of this statute, they meant to declare that, however flagrant the misconduct of an attorney, if it was less than a felony, the courts were powerless to protect themselves, the profession, and the public. The statute points out two of the causes that peremptorily warrant disbarment proceed-private and public life, was sufficient to justify the court in refusing to declare him now unworthy of the confidence of clients, and to strike his name from the roll of attorneys.

In Goodwin v. Gosnell, 10 Jur. 422, although a solicitor was guilty of advising a client to commit a breach of trust and profiting himself thereby, the court dismissed the proceedings, taking cognizance of his youth and inexperience, and his desire to make complete reparation, and his undertaking to restore the trust property and to pay costs and charges.

In People ex rel. Hart v. Anderson, 21 Colo. 271, 40 Pac. 568, it was found that the notes which were alleged to have been placed in the attorney's hands for collection, and for which the proceeds were not paid over, were in fact sold to the attorney for an adequate consideration, he not being guilty of bad faith.

Statutes.

In a few cases it appears that disbarment proceedings were hampered somewhat by special statutory provisions.

Thus, in Turner v. Walsh, 12 Rob. (La.) 383, although a judgment was obtained against an attorney compelling him to pay over money collected, it was held that his license as an attorney at law could not be withdrawn unless on conviction in the manner prescribed by statute. To the same effect are Chavalon v. Schmidt, 11 Rob. (La.) 91, and Kane v. Haywood, 66 N. C. 1, in the latter case it appearing that the statute 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provided in effect that no attorney at law should be disbarred unless he had been convicted, or in open court confessed himself guilty of some criminal offense.

Misconduct of partner.

Nor does the misconduct of a member of a firm in dealing with a client's money apply to his partner who had no knowledge of, or connection with, the misconduct complained of, so as to sustain disbarment proceedings against the latter. Porter v. Vance, 14 Lea, 629; Re McCaughey, 3 Ont. Rep. 425; Re Ross, 16 Ont. Pr. Rep. 482.

In Klingensmith v. Kepler, 41 Ind. 341, it was held that, since a statute providing for the suspension of an attorney from practice is penal in nature, and should therefore be strictly construed, an attorney cannot be suspended from practice by the acts of his partner in collecting and converting to his own use the money of a client without the former's knowledge or consent. In this case, however, a judgment was rendered for the amount of money collected, and, on return of the case to the circuit court, an amended complaint was filed in which it was asked that, since one of the attorneys was insolvent and the various amounts due the firm assigned to the other who had assumed to pay the firm indebtedness, the latter should be required to account for all sums collected on the trust; and that he be suspended from practice until he should pay off the judgment. It was held, however, by the supreme court, as reported in Kepler v. Klingensmith, 50 Ind. 434, that a failure to ings, but it does not, and was not designed to, limit the right to the causes mentioned. An attorney may be guilty of many offenses, evidencing a want of honesty, probity, and good moral character, that would authorize the court to disbar him independent of the statute. When the client for whom an attorney has collected money and failed upon demand to pay it over desires to proceed against the attorney, the statute directs the method of procedure; and, as held in the Wilson Case, it is exclusive, and must be followed. It would seem that the purpose of this statute was to afford the client a speedy and effectual remedy for the collection of his money wrongfully withheld, and that it was intended more for the benefit of the client than to purify and elevate the profession by removing from its ranks one who had shown himself unworthy to be a member of it. But when an attorney collects the money of his client and fails upon demand to pay it over, he commits an offense greater and broader than a mere injury to his client, and may be proceeded against in the name of the commonwealth for the security of the public, the protection of the courts, and the benefit of the profession. It is certainly a breach of integrity and a manifestation of a lack of probity in an attorney to wrongfully withhold the money of his client. For this offense, although it evinces the unfitness of the attorney to be a member of the legal profession, his client might not desire to proceed against him, and therefore, if the ruling of the lower court was correct, the attorney could not be punished at all for his delinquency. Thus we would have the anomalous state of affairs presented that a practising attorney who was guilty of conduct that brought censure and reproach upon the profession and the courts could not be punished because the particular individual whom he had wronged did not wish to institute proceedings against him. This construction is too narrow. It takes from the court the right to discipline its officers, and denies it the power to take such action as may be necessary to punish an offender who is bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. The failure to pay over money collected in a professional capacity is perhaps more frequently committed by attorneys than any other act of misconduct; yet, if the argument of counsel for appellee was sound, the court would be powerless to correct it, unless the consent of the client could be obtained. When an attorney collects the money of his client and fails to collect and apply such debts to the payment of the judgment would not authorize the suspension of the attorney to whom the accounts had been assigned.

However, in People ex rel. Colorado Bar Asso. v. Betts, 26 Colo. 521, 58 Pac. 1091, where a firm of attorneys, in pursuance of their employment for that purpose, collected money for a client and failed to pay it over, but wrongfully withheld it, frequently stating to their client that they had not collected the money; and the false statements in regard thereto made in the name of the firm were well known to each member,—it was held that there was cause for disbarment of both members of the firm, although one of them had the full benefit of the money collected.

Who may institute proceedings.

The question as to who shall institute the disbarment proceedings against an attorney for the fraudulent appropriation of his client's money has not received much attention from the courts. In many of the above cases the proceedings were instituted by the local bar association or its committee, in many others by the client whose money was appropriated; but it seems that any person or persons interested may institute the proceedings.

In People v. Palmer, 61 Ill. 255, it was held that the statute which authorizes "any person interested" to apply for a rule upon an attorney who has failed to pay over money collected, to show cause why his name should not be stricken from the roll, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

should not receive the narrow construction that the person who may make the application must be a creditor: the court saying that the members of the profession, and other persons besides creditors, had a deep interest in the purity of those who sustain such important relations to the public; and that, besides, in motions of this character, there is no individual party, the information being presented in the name and in behalf of the people; and in this particular case the state's attorney initiated the proceedings.

And see Wilson v. Popham, 91 Ky. 327, 15 S. W. 859, cited and sufficiently set out in COMMONWEALTH v. ROE.

In Boston Bar Asso. v. Casey, 196 Mass. 100, 81 N. E. 892, it was held that the proceeding was properly brought by the bar association.

In People ex rel. Noyes v. Allison, 68 Ill. 151, where it did not appear but what the money had long since been paid, and that there was a dispute as to the attorney's fee, it was said that, if the party entitled was satisfied and made no complaint, the relator, who in this case was a stranger, need not concern himself about the matter.

In Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 13 L.R.A. 767, 22 Atl. 441, it was held that attorneys preferring charges of unprofessional conduct against another attorney, for the purpose of having him disbarred, need not show that they constitute a committee appointed by the bar association of the county for that purpose, either to establish their right to institute the proceeding, or to give the court jurisdiction.

pay it over, he may be proceeded against by the client under the statute and in the manner therein provided; and he may also be proceeded against by the commonwealth for the commission of an offense involving a lack of honesty, as well as probity and good character. The statute provides that a person who desires to obtain license to practise law in this commonwealth must first procure from the county judge of the county of his residence a certificate that he is a person of honesty, probity, and good moral character; and, to enable him to continue in the practice of his chosen profession, it is essential that he should maintain these attributes. It is not enough that he possesses them when he enters the profession. Indeed, it is more important that they be preserved throughout his professional career than that he have them in its beginning, although we would not underestimate their importance at any time. Courts independent of statutes have at all times possessed the inherent right to control and regulate the official conduct of their officers, and to inflict upon them punishment for official misconduct. Attorneys at law are officers of the court, and it has always been the rule in this state that, when the attention of the court in which they practise was called to acts of professional misconduct, it had the right to disbar them if the facts of the case justified the infliction of this punishment. Thus, in Rice v. Com. 18 B. Mon. 472, the court, in speaking of the right to disbar an attorney, said: "If a court have knowledge of the existence of such official misconduct on the part of any of its officers, it not only has the power, but it is its duty, to institute an appropriate proceeding against the offender, and to bring him, if guilty, to condign punishment. . . . [Attorneys at law are officers of the court.] The official misconduct of an attorney at law may be inquired into in a summary manner by the court, and, if guilty of such misconduct, his name may be stricken from the roll of attorneys admitted to the practice of law at the bar of the court." In Baker v. Com. 10 Bush, 592, the court said: "When an attorney commits an act, whether in the discharge of his duties as attorney or not, showing such a want of personal or professional honesty as renders him unworthy of public confidence, it is not only the province, but the duty, of the court, upon a proper and legitimate presentation of the case, to strike his name from the roll of attorneys. Nor is it necessary, as contended by appellant's counsel, that the offense should be of such a nature as would subject him to an indictment. . . . The question of the power of the court to strike the name of an attorney from the rolls in a proceeding like this, for such a cause, has been recognized and maintained by so many adjudications that it cannot at this day be considered an open question." To the same effect is Walker v. Com. 8 Bush, 86; Com. v. Richie, 114 Ky. 366, 70 S. W. 1054; Underwood v. Com. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 32, 105 S. W. 151; Nelson v. Com. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 143, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 272, 109 S. W. 337. In Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 646, the court said: "This power of removal from the bar is possessed by all courts which have authority to admit attorneys to practise. It is a power which should only be exercised for the most weighty reasons, such as would render the continuance of the attorney in practice incompatible with a proper respect of the court for itself, or a proper regard for the integrity of the profession."

While this right of disbarment for proper cause is universally upheld as a legitimate exercise of power inherent in courts, it ought to be, as well expressed by Chief Justice Marshall in Ex parte Burr, 9 Wheat. 529, 6 L. ed. 152, exercised with great moderation and judgment. Nor do we wish to be understood as holding that it is only for professional or official misconduct in the capacity of an attorney that a licensed lawyer may be disbarred. Aside from his professional or official behavior, an attorney may be personally so disreputable a character, or be guilty of such gross misconduct outside of his professional duties and employment, as to render him unworthy of public confidence, and incapable of discharging in the proper manner his obligations as an officer of the court; or, to put it in another and perhaps better way, evince by his acts a lack of good moral character, and thus bring upon himself the punishment of disbarment. Our opinion, in harmony with all the cases both in and out of this state, is that, independent of any statute, the court may, upon the motion of the commonwealth by its attorney, after due notice to the accused, and fair opportunity for hearing, disbar an attorney who has been guilty of such personal or professional conduct as proves him to be unworthy to have his name upon the rolls. As honesty, probity, and good moral character are necessary qualifications for admission to the bar, and their existence is essential to the continuance of the relation, therefore, when an attorney ceases to possess these traits of character in whatever mode or manner the want of them is exhibited, he may be removed. We do not, of course, undertake to prescribe any rule of conduct that attorneys must follow to avoid committing acts of disbarment, or to set down the specific acts of personal or professional misconduct that will subject them to this punishment. Want of honesty, probity, and good moral character may be manifested in various ways, and each case must be adjudged as seems right upon the facts presented in its investigation. But, with reference to the particular matter before us, we have no hesitation in saying that an attorney who intentionally and wrongfully withholds after demand money he has collected for his client is guilty of such misconduct as shows him to be unworthy to be a member of the legal profession or an officer of the court, and authorizes in a proper proceeding his disbarment.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is reversed, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

MRS. B. A. SLEET, Appt.,
v.

FARMERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF BOONE COUNTY, KEN-TUCKY.

(— Ky. —, 113 S. W. 515.)

Insurance — lightning — liability.

Recovery for loss of a barn by being knocked down by lightning, but not burned, cannot be had under a policy in a mutual company insuring against loss by fire, although the custom has been to pay such losses and to levy assessments therefor on the policy holders, since such payments were merely misappropriations of funds by the company.

(November 13, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County dismissing a petition filed to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. G. Tomlin, and J. L. Vest, for appellant:

The custom or usage of appellee in paying all similar losses may be pleaded in aid of the interpretation of the policy, and as a valid and binding by-law legally established by long use and acquiescence upon the part of those who had the power to do so.

State ex rel. Corey v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 335; Henry v. Jackson, 37 Vt. 431; Bank of Holly Springs v. Pinson, 58 Miss. 421, 38 Am. Rep. 330; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 494; 1 May, Ins. § 179; Babcock v. Montgomery County Mut. Ins. Co. 6 Barb. 637, affirmed in 4 N. Y. 336.

Messrs. Sidney Gaines and Clore, Dickerson, & Clayton for appellee.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 5th day of February, 1906, the appellee, the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company, issued a policy of insurance to the appellant, Mrs. B. A. Sleet, the material parts of which are as follows: "By this policy of insurance, and for and in consideration of four and $\frac{2}{100}$ dollars, and a premium note of ninety-four and $\frac{40}{100}$ dollars, by said company received, do insure Mrs. B. A. Sleet, of Boone county, Kentucky, against loss or damage by fire to the amount of the insurance is then distributed as described in application and survey No. 5053, as follows, to wit: . . ." The amount of the insurance is then distributed over the dwelling house and the various barns and sheds and other buildings upon the farm, among which was a barn 60 by 40 by 18, which was insured for \$500. As this was the only building destroyed, it is not necessary to set forth the particular distribution of the remainder. The covenant of Case Note. — Custom to pay certain class of losses as affecting liability of insurer for such a loss not covered by the policy.

An extensive search has disclosed but one other case in which this precise question was discussed, though many decisions are found in the books involving the effect of a custom or usage of trade upon the meaning of the terms used in contract of insurance. In Smith v. Mobile Nav. & Mut. Ins. Co. 30 Ala. 167, it was held that parol evidence of a custom could not be received to show that a marine policy of insurance on goods shipped from one port to another covered the overland transportation of the goods by railroad to the port of shipment. The court said that, if the policy had contained a distinct statement that the insurers agreed to indemnify the owners for loss of the goods only while they were water bound, it could not be contended that it could be shown by usage or local custom that the insurer was liable for a loss of the goods on land.

Attention should, however, be called to Lattomus v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Houst. (Del.) 254, in which the court, without rendering an opinion, sustained a demurrer to a defense upon a policy of fire insurance which was silent upon the effect of additional insurance, that there were a custom and by-law of the insurer whereby, if other insurance was carried, the insurer became liable only for such proportion of the loss as the amount of the insurance carried by it bore to the whole amount of insurance.

the company is as follows: "And the said company do promise and agree, and with the insured, to make unto her, her executors, administrators, and assigns, all such loss or damage, not exceeding in amount the sum insured, as shall happen by fire to the property above specified during the term of five years from the 2d day of March, 1900, at 12 o'clock (noon), unto the 2d day of March, 1911, at 12 o'clock (noon)." Prior to the institution of this action, and during the insurance-contract period, the barn in question was struck by lightning, and knocked down, but not burned. Thereupon the appellant demanded payment from the company of the sum of $500, and, upon its refusal to pay her, she instituted this action.

The plaintiff, in her petition, sets forth the insurance contract as hereinbefore stated, the destruction of the barn by lightning, the demand of payment, and refusal, and alleges that at the time of the execution and delivery of the policy of insurance it was and had been for many years the uniform practice and custom of the defendant, the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company, to pay for all losses or damages done to buildings insured in the company when injured or destroyed by lightning, the same as though injured or destroyed by fire; that this custom was well known to the defendant at the time of the execution of the policy of insurance, and had been practised and observed by it at all times before and since the execution of the policy; that the custom on the part of the defendant insurance company entered into and formed a part of the contract of insurance herein sued on, and since the execution and delivery of the policy the defendant company had made assessments on all losses by lightning, and plaintiff has paid all assessments when called upon by the company, and contributed to the payment of all losses by lightning which were insured by the defendant company and occurred since the issue of the policy. Afterwards she amended her petition, and alleged that the defendant is a mutual company, and all of the losses and other expenses that are now or ever have been paid by it are paid from funds derived by assessments on the several policy holders insured by it according to the amounts of their respective policies. A general demurrer was interposed by the defendant to the petition as amended, and sustained by the court, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, her petition was dismissed. The trial court was clearly right in sustaining the demurrer. The policy is filed as an exhibit, and its essential parts are copied above. The covenant of the defendant with the plaintiff was to indemnify her against loss occasioned by fire. She was not entitled to recover for loss by lightning which did not burn, but merely knocked down, the barn, any more than she would have been entitled to recover under the policy if it had been blown down by a windstorm. If the officers of the company had paid the plaintiff, it would have been a misappropriation of the money of the corporation. The plaintiff's position is not aided by the allegation that other losses occasioned by lightning had been paid under contracts similar to that sued on. If this be true,—and the demurrer, for the purpose of testing the petition, admits it,—it would only show that the officers in charge of the corporate funds had been guilty of the payment of erroneous claims. The prior errors of the defendant company do not constitute a custom of the trade or of the community. The plaintiff's right must stand or fall by the written contract; and this clearly shows that the loss accruing to her was not occasioned by fire, and therefore not within the terms of the contract of indemnity purchased by her.

Judgment affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

OPINION OF JUSTICES.

LEGISLATIVE PROHIBITION OF TREE CUTTING.

(— Me. —, 69 Atl. 627.)

Trees—cutting—prohibition—Federal Constitution.

1. Regulation by the state of the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild and uncultivated land, or prohibition of the wanton cutting of small trees on such lands which are of equal or greater value standing than cut, for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the state, is not a taking of property for which com-

Case Note.—Constitutionality of legislation restricting or regulating the right to cut timber on private land.

In view of the present widespread discussion of the subject of the conservation of the natural resources of the country, the foregoing opinion is of especial interest. A search has failed to disclose any other case involving the constitutionality of legislation regulating or restricting the right to cut timber upon private land; but in a few cases the courts have upheld statutes of a very similar character, and in language sufficiently broad to indicate that they would uphold legislation of the character of that discussed in the foregoing opinion. Thus, in Com. v. Tewksbury, 11 Met.

pensation must be made under the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, since that amendment was not intended to interfere with the police power of the state.

Same — discrimination — classification.

2. Regulating or prohibiting the cutting of trees on wild or uncultivated lands for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the state is not a denial of the equal protection of the laws, since the classification is based on real differences in the nature, situation, and condition of things.

Trees — protection — property rights — compensation.

3. Private property is not taken, so as to require compensation, by regulating the cutting of trees on wild and uncultivated land to protect the public water supply, and, for the same purpose, prohibiting the cutting of small trees on such property, the value of which standing is equal to or greater than when cut, and regulating the cutting of small trees on such land to enhance the value of such land and the trees thereon, and promote the interests of the owners and the common welfare of the public.

SUBMISSION by the Senate for the Opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of questions relating to the power of the legislature to regulate or prohibit the cutting or destruction of trees on wild or uncultivated land. Legislation sanctioned.

In Senate, March 27, 1907.

The justices of the supreme judicial court are hereby requested to give to the senate, according to the provisions of the Constitution in this behalf, their opinion on the following questions, to wit:

55, which is cited in OPINION OF JUSTICES, the court said: "All property is acquired and held under the tacit condition that it shall not be so used as to injure the equal rights of others, or to destroy or greatly impair the public rights and interests of the community, under the maxim of the common law, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. When the injury is plain and palpable, it may be a nuisance at the common law, to be restrained and punished by indictment. . . . But there are many cases where the things done in particular places, or under a particular state of facts, would be injurious, when, under a change of circumstances, the same would be quite harmless. . . . In such cases, we think, it is competent for the legislature to interpose, and, by positive enactment, to prohibit a use of property which would be injurious to the public, under particular circumstances, leaving the use of similar property unlimited, where the obvious con-

In order to promote the common welfare of the people of Maine by preventing or diminishing injurious droughts and freshets, and by protecting, preserving, and maintaining the natural water supply of the springs, streams, ponds, and lakes, and of the land, and by preventing or diminishing injurious erosion of the land and the filling up of the rivers, ponds, and lakes, and as an efficient means necessary to this end, has the legislature power, under the Constitution:

(1) By public general law to regulate or restrict the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild or uncultivated land by the owner thereof, without compensation therefor to such owner?

(2) To prohibit, restrict, or regulate the wanton, wasteful, or unnecessary cutting or destruction of small trees growing on any wild or uncultivated land by the owner thereof, without compensation therefor to such owner, in case such small trees are of equal or greater actual value standing and remaining for their future growth than for immediate cutting, and such trees are not intended or sought to be cut for the purpose of clearing and improving such land for use or occupation in agriculture, mining, quarrying, manufacturing, or business, or for pleasure purposes, or for a building site; or

(3) In such manner to regulate or restrict the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild or uncultivated lands by the owners thereof as to preserve or enhance the value of such lands and trees thereon and protect and promote the interests of such owners and the common welfare of the people?

(4) Is such regulation of the control, management, or use of private property a siderations of public good do not require the restraint. This is undoubtedly a high power, and is to be exercised with the strictest circumspection, and with the most sacred regard to the right of private property, and only in cases amounting to an obvious public exigency. Still, we think the power exists, and has been long exercised in cases more or less analogous."

So, in Hodges v. Perrine, 24 Hun. 516, it was held that a court of equity would not interfere to obstruct the due execution of a penal statute forbidding the removal of sand which formed a natural barrier between the sea and a public highway, for, assuming that the plaintiff had an absolute title to the beach, yet the power of the legislature to prevent the removal of the sand rested upon the familiar maxim that every owner of land must so use his property as not to injure the public interests.

taking thereof for public uses for which compensation must be made?

In Senate Chamber, March 27, 1907.

Read and passed.

F. G. Farrington, Secretary.

To the Honorable Senate of the Seventy-Third Legislature:

The undersigned justices, in obedience to the requirement of the Constitution, severally give the following as their advisory opinion upon the questions of law submitted to the justices of the supreme judicial court by the senate order of March 27, 1907:

We find that the legislature has, by the Constitution, "full power to make and establish all reasonable laws and regulations for the defense and benefit of the people of this state, not repugnant to this Constitution nor to that of the United States." Me. Const. art. 4, pt. 3, § 1. It is for the legislature to determine from time to time the occasion, and what laws and regulations are necessary or expedient for the defense and benefit of the people; and, however inconvenienced, restricted, or even damaged, particular persons and corporations may be, such general laws and regulations are to be held valid, unless there can be pointed out some provision in the state or United States Constitution which clearly prohibits them. These we understand to be universally accepted principles of constitutional law.

As to the proposed laws and regulations named in the senate order, the only provision of the United States Constitution having any possible application to such legislation by a state would seem to be that in the 14th Amendment. As to that provision, we think it sufficient to quote the language of the United States Supreme Court in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, where, speaking of the 14th Amendment, the court said: "But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its 'police power,' to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity." It may be added that the proposed laws and regulations would not discriminate between persons or corporations, but only between things and situations, with a classification not merely arbitrary, but based on real differences in the nature, situation, and condition of things.

We think the only provisions in the state Constitution that could be reasonably invoked against the proposed laws and regulations are the guaranteed right of "acquiring, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) possessing, and defending property," and the provision that "private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation." Declaration of Rights, §§ 1, 21. If, however, the proposed legislation would not conflict with the latter provision, it evidently would not with the former. Hence only the latter one need be considered.

The question of what constitutes a "taking" of private property in the constitutional sense of the term has been much considered and variously decided. In the earlier cases and in the older states the provision has been construed strictly. In some estates in later cases it has been construed more widely to include legislation formerly not considered within the provision. Still more recently, however, the tendency seems to be back to the principles enunciated in the earlier cases. In Massachusetts, one of the earliest states to adopt the constitutional provision, and in Maine, adopting the same provision in succession, the courts have uniformly considered that it was to be construed strictly as against the police power of the legislature.

Com. v. Tewksbury, 11 Met. 55, decided in 1846, was a case where the legislature prohibited the owners from removing "any stones, gravel, or sand" from their beaches in Chelsea as necessary for the protection of Boston harbor. The court held that the statute did not operate to "take" property within the meaning of the Constitution, but was "a just and legitimate exercise of the power of the legislature to regulate and restrain such particular use of property as would be inconsistent with or injurious to the rights of the public." Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, decided in 1851, was a case where the defendant was prohibited by statute from erecting and maintaining a wharf on his own land (flats) beyond certain fixed lines. The court held that the defendant's title to the land (flats) was a fee simple, and that but for the statute he would have had full right to erect and maintain wharves upon any part of it where they would not obstruct navigation. It was not claimed that the proposed wharf would obstruct navigation, but rather admitted that it would not. The court further held, however, that the statute was within the legislative power, and not forbidden by any clause in the Constitution. The question was considered at length in an opinion by Chief Justice Shaw, and the principle stated as follows, viz. (page 84): "We think it a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this commonwealth, as well that in the interior as that bordering on tide waters, is derived directly or indirectly from the government, and held subject to those general regulations which are necessary for the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain," etc.

In the case Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 188, decided in 1835, only fifteen years after the adoption of our Constitution, there was upon the plaintiff's land a wooden building. A city ordinance was passed by legislative authority prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within certain limits, which included the plaintiff's building. After the passage of the ordinance, the plaintiff moved his building to another place within the same inhibited limits. The defendant as city marshal, acting under the ordinance, entered upon the plaintiff's land, and took the building down. The court held the ordinance valid and the defendant protected, and declared as follows (page 405 of 12 Me.): "Police regulations may forbid such a use and such modifications of private property as would prove injurious to the citizens generally. This is one of the benefits which men derive from associating in communities. It may sometimes occasion an inconvenience to an individual, but he has a compensation in participating in the general advantage. Laws of this character are unquestionably within the scope of the legislative power without impairing any constitutional provision. It does not appropriate private property to public uses, but merely regulates its enjoyment." In Cushman v. Smith, 34 Me. 247, decided fifteen years later, in an elaborate opinion by Chief Justice Shepley, the court said of the constitutional provision in question (page 258): "The design appears to have been simply to declare that private property shall not be changed to public property, nor transferred from the owner to others for public use without compensation." In Jordan v. Woodward, 40 Me. 317, it was said by the court at page 324: "Strictly speaking, private property can only be said to have been taken for public uses when it has been so appropriated 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) that the public have certain and well-defined rights to that use secured, as the right to use the public highway, the turnpike, the public ferry, the railroad, and the like." The same doctrine was recognized in Preston v. Drew, 33 Me. 558, 54 Am. Dec. 639; State v. Gurney, 37 Me. 156, 58 Am. Dec. 782; Boston & M. R. Co. v. York County, 79 Me. 386, 10 Atl. 113, and as late as 1905 in State v. Robb, 100 Me. 180, 60 Atl. 874, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 275.

There are two reasons of great weight for applying this strict construction of the constitutional provision to property in land: (1) Such property is not the result of productive labor, but is derived solely from the state itself, the original owner; (2) the amount of land being incapable of increase, if the owners of large tracts can waste them at will without state restriction, the state and its people may be helplessly impoverished and one great purpose of government defeated.

Regarding the question submitted, in the light of the doctrine above stated (being that of Maine and Massachusetts at least), we do not think the proposed legislation would operate to "take" private property within the inhibition of the Constitution. While it might restrict the owner of wild and uncultivated lands in his use of them, might delay his taking some of the product, might defer his anticipated profits, and even thereby might cause him some loss of profit, it would nevertheless leave him his lands, their product and increase untouched and without diminution of title, estate, or quantity. He would still have large measure of control and large opportunity to realize values. He might suffer delay, but not deprivation. While the use might be restricted, it would not be appropriated or "taken."

In the following cases restrictive statutes for the protection of property and other material interests of the people were held to be within the police power, and not a taking of private property, viz.: (Limiting the height of buildings though the owner owns usque ad cælum) Welch v. Swasey, 193 Mass. 364, 118 Am. St. Rep. 523, 79 N. E. 745; (prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within specified limits) Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, 28 Am. Dec. 188; (even when the owner had begun to erect the building before the statute was enacted) Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372; (authorizing the destruction of buildings without compensation to prevent the spread of conflagration) American Print Works v. Lawrence, 23 N. J. L. 9; (prohibiting the further use of buildings and appliances for brewing purposes although they had been erected and fitted for that purpose when brewing was a lawful business) Mugler v.

Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; (prohibiting the erection of fences on one's own land to gratify spite against others) Karasek v. Peier, 22 Wash. 419, 50 L.R.A. 345, 61 Pac. 33; Smith v. Morse, 148 Mass. 407, 19 N. E. 393; (prohibiting the wasteful burning of natural gas by the owner) Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 37 L.R.A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477, 47 N. E. 19; (prohibiting the use of artificial means by the owners of gas wells to increase the natural flow of the gas from them) Manufacturers' Gas & Oil Co. v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. 155 Ind. 467, 50 L.R.A. 768, 57 N. E. 912; (authorizing dams for the purpose of reclaiming swamp lands where the effect was to oblige land-owners to construct and maintain dikes to protect their lands from the water raised) Manigault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 473, 50 L. ed. 274, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127; (prohibiting one from allowing weeds to grow on his own land) St. Louis v. Galt, 179 Mo. 8, 63 L.R.A. 778, 77 S. W. 876; (limiting the quantity of land any person or family may cultivate within city limits) Summerville v. Pressley, 33 S. C. 56, 8 L.R.A. 854, 26 Am. St. Rep. 659, 11 S. E. 545; (prohibiting the flow of water from a private artesian well except for certain specified beneficial purposes, as irrigation or domestic use) Ex parte Elam, 6 Cal. App. 233, 91 Pac. 811. In Windsor v. State, 103 Md. 611, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 869, 64 Atl. 288, a statute restricted owners of private oyster beds in taking oysters from them. It was held constitutional, and not a taking of private property. The court, quoting from Judge Story, said: "Property of every kind is held subject to those regulations which are necessary for the common good and general welfare. And the legislature has the power to define the mode and manner in which everyone may use his property."

The foregoing considerations lead us to the opinion at present that the proposed legislation for the purposes and with the limitations named in the senate order would be within the legislative power, and would not operate as a taking of private property for which compensation must be made.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. Justice Woodward, one of the justices of the court when the senate order was passed, died before the foregoing opinion could be prepared. His successor, Mr. Justice King, was not appointed for several months after the passage of the senate order, and holds that, therefore, the senate has not required any opinion from him.

Lucillius A. Emery.

To the Honorable Senate of the Seventy-Third Legislature:

By an order of the senate passed March 27, 1907, the justices of the supreme judicial court were requested to give to the senate their opinion on certain questions, involving the power of the legislature, under the Constitution, to prohibit, regulate, or restrict the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild or uncultivated land, by the owner thereof, without compensation therefor to the owner, in order, as an efficient means necessary to the end, to promote the common welfare of the people of Maine by preventing or diminishing injurious droughts and freshets, and by protecting, preserving, and maintaining the natural water supply of the springs, streams, ponds, and lakes, and of the land, and by preventing or diminishing injurious erosion of the land, and the filling up of the rivers, ponds, and lakes. The seventy-first legislature adjourned finally on the following day, March 28, 1907, and the order was received by me April 6, 1907, nine days after the adjournment of the legislature. I now respectfully make the following answer to the order:

The Constitution provides (art. 6, § 3) that the justices "shall be obliged to give their opinion upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions, when required by the governor, council, senate, or house of representatives." By this constitutional provision, of course, the justices are not obliged to give their opinion unless the inquiries relate to "important questions of law," nor unless they are made upon "solemn occasions." And, as I shall undertake briefly to show hereinafter, if the justices are not obliged to answer the questions, if they do not relate to important questions of law, or if the occasions are not solemn, it would be improper and inexpedient for them to give their opinion. And, if this be so, they have no right to give an opinion, and may properly decline and should decline to do so.

So that I must first inquire whether the constitutional exigency has arisen, which requires or, in other words, which makes it proper for me to give my opinion on the questions presented. And this involves the further inquiry: Who is to decide? Is the order of the senate conclusive upon the justices; or have the justices, each for himself, an independent right, equal with that of the senate, to determine the question? These alternatives were very carefully considered by all the justices in their opinions in answer to an order of the house of representatives, found in 95 Me. 564, 51 Atl. 224. And a majority of those then in commission were firmly of the opinion that the justices, each for himself, must determine whether the condition exists which requires the giving of an opinion. Among the justices who were then of that opinion were the late Chief Justice Wiswell and Justice Fogler, both since deceased, and Justice Powers, since resigned. The conclusions thus expressed by the majority of the justices were based, not only upon a careful analysis of the constitutional provision itself and the relations existing between the legislative and judicial departments of the government, but also upon the unanimous opinion of the justices who composed the court in 1891 (85 Me. 546, 27 Atl. 454), as well as upon the opinions of the courts in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, under similar constitutional provisions (122 Mass. 600; 126 Mass. 557; 148 Mass. 623, 21 N. E. 439; 56 N. H. 574; 67 N. H. 600, 43 Atl. 1074).

But, since I have been advised that I alone of the present justices hesitate to answer the questions submitted by the senate, I have carefully reviewed the constitutional questions involved, and it is with sincere regret, after reconsideration and much reflection, that I feel compelled to say that the opinion of the majority of the justices in 95 Me. 564, 51 Atl. 224, and the reasons given therefor, which I then subscribed, but which I need not repeat, seem to me to be sound and compelling, and that I cannot do otherwise than adhere to them. When under the Constitution I am asked, as a member of that court which the Constitution makes both independent and co-ordinate with the other branches of the government, and of that court whose interpretation of the Constitution is binding upon all the branches of the government, to give my opinion to either of those branches, I think I am bound to interpret what the Constitution means by "important questions of law," and by "solemn occasions," and by that interpretation to determine whether the question is important and the occasion solemn.

There can be no doubt that the order under consideration presents important questions of constitutional law. The only question is: Is the occasion solemn? I make no question but that when either branch of the legislature asks the opinion of the justices touching pending legislation, or it may be even upon matters concerning which that branch may be expected to act, and can act, it is a solemn occasion within the meaning of the Constitution. On the other hand, it is my conviction that, when there is no pending legislation touching which the opinion of the justices is asked, or when it is demonstrably clear that the body asking the opinion neither expects nor intends to act upon it, and therefore has no occasion to be advised, it is not a solemn occasion.

I cannot conceive it to have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, or of the people who adopted it, that the justices should be required by a branch of the legislature to give their opinion on questions of law merely for the information of the public, or for the possible use of future legislatures. Each legislature will judge for itself what advice it needs, and what subjects it will legislate upon.

I hold that it is not a solemn occasion, within the meaning of the Constitution, unless the body asking the questions is in a position to act later in the light of such opinions as may be given. The Constitution implies, I think, that the opinion may be of some use to the body requiring it in the performance of its constitutional functions. If not, there is no occasion, solemn or otherwise, for the opinion.

As already stated, the order now being considered was passed March 27th. The legislature adjourned March 28th. The legislative history of these two days, which is now a part of the recorded history of the state, shows that the legislature was on the eve of adjournment when the order was passed. It had so far completed its work, and the hour of expected final adjournment was so near that by no possibility could the opinion of the justices have been obtained before such adjournment. And apparently there was not then, nor has there been since, any reason to expect the legislature to be reconvened. I am therefore, I think, compelled to conclude that the senate requested the opinion of the justices not for use in any expected action, to be taken by itself, but for the future use of the public, or of future legislatures. If so, I think the occasion was not a solemn one. And, in this connection, I refer again to the opinion of the majority of the justices in 95 Me. 564, 51 Atl. 224, and to the reasons given and to the authorities cited therein. And I may add that, even if it was a solemn occasion when the order was passed, it had ceased to be such nine days before the order came to me.

To my mind it is manifestly improper for the justices to express their opinions on questions of law concerning the right of citizens, except in the performance of their judicial functions, unless it be in the case of a constitutional solemn occasion, as I have conceived it to be defined. I think that this provision of the Constitution should be read and construed in the light of that fundamental provision of law that the citizen shall not be deprived of his life, liberty, property, or privileges, except by the "law of the land," that law "which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial."

Any answers to the questions before me will vitally affect the interests of many hundreds of property owners, and a vast amount of property. To lay down a rule which deprives a man of his property or restricts him in the use of it is, in effect, to deprive him of his property. But the justices are asked to determine whether such rule may be laid down. They are asked to do this under circumstances which preclude argument. The persons to be affected are virtually to lose the protection of the law of the land. They are not suitors. They are not to be heard before they are condemned. There is to be no inquiry, and judgment is to be rendered before, and not after trial.

The answer usually given to this proposition is that the justices are not bound by their opinions thus given, that they are opinions simply, and not law, and that when actual cases arise, and suitors are in court and are heard, the justices as a court are at perfect liberty to lay down such doctrine and render such judgment as may then seem to them meet. It may be so. Nevertheless it is my belief that, while human and judicial nature remain as we know them to be, the opinion of the justices will quite likely be the judgment of the court. And, in any event, it must be said that the right of the citizen is likely to be prejudiced, if not prejudged.

These considerations, of course, should not and do not prevent full force being given that provision of the Constitution which is under consideration. Either branch of the legislature may require the opinion of the justices upon solemn occasions, and in such case the citizen must be content to be prejudiced, and practically prejudged. And no doubt, when such opinions are asked upon such solemn occasions, as I understand the Constitution to mean, they may so serve the public good that individual interests ought to yield the rightful advantage of being heard.

But the considerations I have named do demonstrate, I think, the expediency and necessity of limiting the giving of these extrajudicial opinions to such occasions as fall fairly within the spirit as well as the language of the Constitution. And they emphasize what seems to me to be the impropriety of giving such opinions, unless when required by the Constitution, as well as when requested by another branch of the government.

With great deference to your honorable body, the undersigned, a justice of the supreme judicial court, for the reasons stated, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

feels compelled most respectfully to decline to give an opinion upon the questions submitted.
Albert R. Savage.

v.

AMERICAN BANKING & TRUST COMPANY et al.

(— Me. —, 69 Atl. 771.)

Corporation — acceptance of amendment — presumption.

1. Permitting a corporation to continue in business and exercise powers conferred by an amendment to its charter imposing an additional liability on stockholders is sufficient to establish their acceptance of the amendment after contracts have been made for the performance of which their liability is sought to be enforced.

Stockholders' liability — limitation of action.

2. The statute of limitations begins to run against the statutory liability of stockholders for debts of the corporation when the creditors' remedies against the corporation, and its assets have been exhausted.

Creditors' bill — exhaustion of corporate assets — establishment of.

3. A decree declaring the assets of a corporation to be exhausted leaving debts un-

Case Note. — Does statutory liability of stockholders for debts of corporation include interest thereon?

It is not intended to include in this note cases involving the liability of a stockholder of an insolvent corporation for unpaid stock subscriptions.

Cases bearing upon the question under consideration may fairly be classified as follows: (1) Right to interest in actions by creditors against stockholders to enforce their statutory liability for the debts of the corporation; (2) right to interest as against the insolvent estate; (3) right to interest in addition to statutory liability. Cases will be considered herein according to the foregoing classification.

Actions by creditors against.

Where the statutory liability of the stockholders of a corporation is for its contracts, debts, and engagements to a certain limit, a creditor has, as against a stockholder, the same right to recover interest which, according to the nature of the contract or debt, would exist against the corporation itself, as it would were the action against the corporation; not, however, in excess of the stockholder's maximum liability as fixed by the statute.

One of the leading cases wherein the foregoing doctrine was enunciated is Richmond paid is not necessary to justify a creditors' suit to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, if the report of the commissioner on claims and that of the receiver have been allowed, which show that fact.

Corporation — stockholders' liability — interest.

4. The statutory liability of stockholders for debts of the corporation extends to interest on claims beyond the time the affairs of the corporation are placed in the hands of a receiver, although the commissioner appointed to determine the claims in the receivership proceedings was instructed to allow interest to the date of the receivership.

Same — payment of principal.

5. The fact that the principal of the debt of a corporation has been paid by its receiver out of its assets does not prevent the maintenance of an action against the stockholders for unpaid interest, under a statute making them individually liable for the debts of the corporation, where the payments by the receiver were not accepted in full payment of the corporate debts, but merely as dividends thereon.

Same — delay of administration.

6. A creditor of a corporation cannot be deprived of the right to enforce interest on his claim, against stockholders under their statutory liability for the corporate debts, for the period covering the time the affairs of the corporation are being wound up by the receiver, on the ground that it would be a hardship on them to hold them liable for interest during the delays of administration of the estate.

Same — receiver's misconduct.

7. The shareholders of a corporation, and not its creditors, must bear the loss occa-

v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 30 L. ed. 864, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788. In this case the court was considering the liability of the stockholders of an insolvent bank under the national banking laws, which make the shareholders individually liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of a bank, to the extent of the amount of stock standing in the name of each shareholder. It was held that, up to the maximum amount of a shareholder's liability, interest should be computed on claims of creditors after suspension to the same extent as it would if the action was against the bank itself, in ascertaining the amount such shareholder would have to pay.

To the same effect, also, is Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 28 L.R.A. 231, 8 C. C. A. 155, 16 U. S. App. 465, 59 Fed. 372, wherein it was also specifically held that, as against its stockholders, claims continued to bear interest after suspension.

So, in Re Warren, 52 Mich. 557, 18 N. W. 356, an action to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders in a bank, under a very similar statute, it was held that the liability of the shareholders was commensurate with that of the corporation itself, and extended to costs and interest on the judgment against the bank, which it was being sought to enforce against the shareholders.

So, where stockholders, by statute, were made responsible for the debts, contracts, and engagements of a bank, it was said in Zang v. Wyant, 25 Colo. 551, 71 Am. St. Rep. 145, 56 Pac. 565, that if, from the nature of the contract or debt, interest was allowable against the bank, it would constitute a part of its indebtedness for which the stockholders were made liable, provided it was within the maximum liability as fixed by statute.

Under a statute imposing upon each stockholder an individual liability for his equal proportion of all contracts, debts, and engagements of the corporation to the extent of the amount of his stock at the par value thereof, interest upon these contracts, debts, and engagements runs until their total amount is ascertained and liquidated and a ratable apportionment thereupon made. This interest is included in ascertaining the total sum to be apportioned, and the stockholder's liability is for his share of the total sum, to the extent of the amount of his stock at its par value. Mahoney v. Bernhard, 45 App. Div. 499, 63 N. Y. Supp. 642, affirmed on opinion of lower court in 169 N. Y. 589, 62 N. E. 1097.

To the same effect are Barnes v. Arnold, 23 Misc. 197, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1109, and Western Nat. Bank v. Faber, 29 Misc. 467, 62 N. Y. Supp. 82 (liability of a director of a corporation for its debts for failing to file an annual report).

If the claim of a creditor of a corporation consists of both principal and interest, he is just as much entitled to the latter as to the former; and the statutory liability of stockholders of insolvent corporations to pay the debts of the corporations within certain limits must necessarily include the accrued interest on the debts up to the statutory limit. Wheeler v. Millar, 90 N. Y. 353.

This doctrine was also stated in Haslett v. Wotherspoon, 1 Strobh. Eq. 209, in an action for unpaid stock subscriptions.

And in Cumberland Lumber Co. v. Clinton Hill Lumber Co. 64 N. J. Eq. 521, 54 Atl. 452, on an application of the receiver to assess stockholders of an insolvent corporation for an amount sufficient to cover the debts of the corporation, for the payment of which such stockholders were liable by statute, it was held that the claims of creditors, with interest on them, were to be included in the amount to be assessed. It was said that, "as against a stockholder, interest is to be allowed to the same extent as if the action were against the corporation itself, not exceeding, however, the maximum liability of the stockholder for unpaid stock."

So, in an action to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders of an insurance company, who, by statute, were rendered individually liable for the debts of the company for an amount equal to their stock, it was held, in Grund v. Tucker, 5 Kan. 70, that it was proper to compute interest on the claim.

Wells, F. & Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 49 L.R.A. 647, 60 Pac. 459, also holds that sioned by loss of assets due to the misconduct of the receiver.

Same — guaranty — demand.

8. Voluntary stopping of payment by a corporation which has sold mortgages with a guaranty of principal and interest and the sequestration of its assets deprives it of the right to insist on a demand upon it for payment of defaulted mortgages to charge it with interest on the demand; and therefore stockholders cannot avoid liability for such interest in actions to enforce their statutory liability for the corporate debts because no demand was made upon the corporation for payment.

Corporation — guaranty — primary liability.

9. A corporation which sells mortgages under a guaranty of principal and interest cannot insist that a purchaser shall proceed in the first instance against a defaulting mortgagor where there is no such provision in the contract.

Stockholders' liability — administration of fund — objection.

10. Stockholders of a corporation which, having guaranteed payment of principal and interest on mortgages sold by it, became insolvent, after which defaulted mortgages were returned to and collected by the receiver, cannot object to his placing the proceeds in the general funds of the corporation, rather than applying them to the individual claims of the purchasers of the mortgages, for the first time after the money has been paid out and the proceeding closed.

Bank deposits — interest.

11. Demand for payment of deposits from a bank which stops payment and the assets of which are sequestered by the court is not stockholders are liable for interest on the debts of the corporation up to the maximum limit of liability assumed by each stockholder for his proportion of the debts of the corporation; and it is said that interest is as much a part of the debt as is the principal. To the same effect is Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047.

To the same effect, as to a statute making stockholders of a corporation liable for its debts to an amount equal to the par value of their stock, are Whitman v. Citizens' Bank, 49 C. C. A. 122, 110 Fed. 503, and Taylor v. West Liberty Wheel Co. 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 947.

Apparent exceptions to this doctrine are the cases of Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met. 525, and Grew v. Breed, 10 Met. 569. The statute considered in these cases, however, differed from the statute in the foregoing cases in that it rendered the shareholders in a bank liable in their individual capacities for the payment and redemption of all bills which may have been issued by said bank, and which shall remain unpaid, in proportion to the stock they may respectively hold at the dissolution of the charter. Under this statute the court said in the Crease Case that the liability of the shareholders depended upon a new and peculiar statutory provision intended better to secure the payment of bills at par, but which did not provide for the payment with interest; that the proportion which each was to pay could be ascertained only by the result of a suit in equity, and that, if that difficulty could have been surmounted, a still greater one lay in the way, that whatever was due from any stockholder was due in various proportions to all the holders of bills. It was impossible, therefore, to pay or tender payment prior to the time of that decision; and therefore the shareholders were not in default, and interest should not be computed on the unpaid bills in ascertaining the amount of their liability.

The same result was also reached under a similar statute in Lane v. Morris, 10 Ga. 102. These cases are not inconsistent with the doctrine that interest should be computed upon debts of a corporation, as against the shareholder's statutory liability for its debts, up to the maximum limit thereof, as the liability assumed by the shareholder under such a statute is to pay the debts of the corporation in which he has stock, up to a maximum limit. Such an assumption of liability fairly covers interest as part of the debt of the corporation. In the latter cases, however, where the liability assumed by the shareholders was to pay all unpaid bank bills issued by the bank in which the stock was held, interest could not fairly be said to be a part of the liability assumed, and the shareholders ought, therefore, not to be charged therewith, at least until default was made.

—right to interest as against the insolvent estate.

It is a general rule that interest does not run in favor of one creditor at the expense of another while the law, acting for all, is administering the assets of the insolvent. This rule is applied to the claims of creditors as against the assets of the estate where the assets are insufficient to pay the original claims in full, or sufficient only for that purpose; and in such case interest will be computed only up to the date of the insolvency or suspension of the business of the corporation, or the appointment of a receiver; in other words, in such cases interest ceases the day the court practically takes possession of the assets for the purpose of distribution among its creditors. People v. American Loan & T. Co. 172 N. Y. 371, 65 N. E. 200; People v. Merchants' Trust Co. 187 N. Y. 293, 79 N. E. 1004. Bank Comrs. v. New Hampshire Trust Co. 69 N. H. 621, 44 Atl. 130; Bank Comrs. v. Security Trust Co. 70 N. H. 536, 49 Atl. 113; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 28 L.R.A. 231, 8 C. C. A. 155, 16 U. S. App. 465, 59 Fed. 372; Solomons v. American Bldg. & L. Asso. 116 Fed. 676, affirmed in 56 C. C. A. 620, 120 Fed. 1018; White v. Knox (United States ex rel. White v. Knox) 111 U. S. 784, 28 L. ed. 603, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686.

As said by Vann, J., in People v. American Loan & T. Co. supra: "Interest should not run in favor of one creditor at the ex-necessary to entitle them to bear interest from the time of such stoppage.

Stockholders' liability — pledges.

12. The statutory liability of stockholders of a corporation rests upon persons holding the stock as collateral security for loans to the real owners, where they appear upon the stock books as owners.

Same — trustee.

13. One cannot avoid his statutory liability for the debts of the corporation by adding the word "trustee" to his name as it stands upon the stock books.

Same — origin of debt.

14. The statutory liability of a stockholder for the debts of a corporation is not affected by whether he purchased his stock before or after the incurring of the debt.

pense of another while the law, acting for all, is administering the assets. If the assets are sufficient to pay all, including interest, it must be paid, for, as against the corporation itself, interest should be allowed before the return of any surplus to the stockholders." To the same effect is People v. Merchants' Trust Co. supra.
